It has already been shown that the College of William and Mary was actually used, prior to its seizure by the United States forces, by the confederate army.

In Jefferson's celebrated letter of May 12, 1792, to Minister Hammond, of Great Britain, on the subject of the liability of a nation to pay for losses sustained by the enemy in war, he says:

Since it is a condition of war that enemies may be deprived of all their rights, it is reasonable that everything of an enemy's found among his enemies should change its owner, and go to the treasury. It is, moreover, usually directed in all declarations of war that the goods of enemies, as well those found among us as those taken in war, shall be confiscated. If we follow the mere right of war, even immovable property may be sold, and its price carried into the treasury, as is the custom of movable property. But in almost all Europe, it is only notified that their profits during the war shall be received by the treasury; and the war being ended, the immovable property itself is restored, by agreement, to the former owner. (Bynk.) Quæs. Jur. Pub., l. 1, c. 7.

This states a sound rule as to the status of all property of belligerants during a war. It is then perfectly clear that the occupancy of this property was not in any sense wrongful.

There was no attempt by its destruction to appropriate it to a public use. The Grant case, decided by the Court of Claims, (1 Court of Claims Rep., p. 41,) now so much celebrated and so often cited, does not furnish a precedent for the payment of this claim.

The court in that case found that a United States officer during the rebellion burned a mill of a loyal man, situate on loyal territory, (Arizona,) which had prior thereto been held and used by the Government of the United States for military uses, and that the mill was burned for the sole purpose of preventing it from falling into the hands of confederate forces and being used by them in aid of insurrection, &c. On this state of facts the court found, as a matter of law, the destruction was an appropriation to a public use and the owner was entitled to be paid for his mill.

The facts of this college case are widely different from those in the Grant case. There was in no sense by the destruction of the college buildings an appropriation of the same to the public use within the meaning of the Constitution.

As has already been shown many losses occur in war which cannot be compensated for to the loyal or disloyal.

The hardships and devastations of war fall unequally. Individual losses are manifold. Hopes are forever blasted and homes made desolate through death and destruction incident to war. Affection and mercy are not attributes of war gods. The great Napoleon said "red-hot shot could not be fired into a populous city with affection." General Sherman said at Atlanta, "War is cruelty and you cannot refine it." For the blood and tears shed in war there is no adequate compensation. A full summary of wrongs growing out of a great war can never be made. The full account of these on either side will never be stated. Reconciliation must come without pecuniary compensation. Purification to all concerned, always incident to the triumph of a holy cause, must be accepted in lieu of the latter. Free schools, a necessary incident of perfect freedom, given to Virginia as a result of the war, must be accepted as ample compensation for the loss of the William and Mary College buildings. Examples of the utter futility of casting up accounts of alleged national wrongs and injuries and demanding their payment are not wanting. There is a notable one of very early origin. Jewish profane and traditionary history informs us that centuries after Moses led the children of Israel out of Egypt across the Red Sea, and thence to Mount Sinai and through the wilderness to the "promised land," the King of Egypt made and presented for payment to the Israelitish nation an account of the damages and losses sustained by Egypt and the Egyptian people caused by the plagues sent by the Lord to soften the heart of Pharaoh, and also an account of the "jewels of silver and jewels of gold and raiment" borrowed of the Egyptians by the Jews at the command of the Lord immediately prior to their exodus.

The claim was stated on the part of Egypt about thus: To loss and damages caused by the river of blood; by the plague of frogs; by the plague of flies; by the murrain of beasts; by the plague of hail; by the plague of locusts, and by the smiting unto death of the "first born of Pharaoh that sat on the throne, unto the first born of the captive that was in the dungeon, and all the first born of cattle;" also for the value of the loaned "jewels of silver and jewels of gold and raiment" never returned. To this was superadded a claim for interest.

The prospect of having to pay so large a claim would appall the people of a rich nation of the present day. Not so the Hebrew people. They regarded the enormous claim with complacency. The Jews were then no special pleaders. They did not seek to cast the responsibility on their Lord. They did not demur because the claim was too remote or stale, nor because Egypt had slept too long on her pretended rights and thereby forfeited them; nor did they traverse the particular charges made or plead the general issue.

Moses had written the book of Exodus, and it had the divine sanction. Its record, to the Jews, imported absolute verity; and thereto turned the confident Egyptians for the proof of their claim. God's "chosen and peculiar people" did not, however, despair. The learned Levites went to work to state an account of offsets. Generally it included but one item, stated about thus: To work and labor performed, and services rendered by the twelve tribes of Israel, during four hundred and thirty years of unrequited Egyptian bondage in the land of Goshen, in Egypt, with all the attendant burdens, sufferings, stripes, tears, sorrows, wrongs, and deaths incident to oriental slavery. The learned ministry of Egypt, on receipt of this account, stood aghast and said, "'Tis enough!" and the claim of the "Land of the Pharaohs" was not further pressed.

This exemplifies the vanity of trying to take an account of great national wrongs, &c. The recording angel only will sum them up at the judgment day; and the Lord of Hosts will wield the divine scepter of justice.

The further application of the illustration I must leave, for want of time, to reflecting minds.

The committee further insist that:

> The colleges of the period preceding the war of the Revolution were among the most potent forces in accomplishing our independence and founding our Constitution.

And they say:

> Among them none can claim precedence over William and Mary.

It is sufficient to say, in answer to this, as has already been shown, that in advancing the cause of rebellion "none can claim precedence over William and Mary."

The committee also express the opinion—

> That if the accidents of war had led to the injury of Mount Vernon, of the house or the tomb of Washington, or of Independence Hall, in Philadelphia, we should have hastened to repair the injury.

These cases are widely different from the one under consideration. These are ancient—I might say sacred—places belonging to the nation, and they have no history around which treason to constitutional liberty ever clustered.

I make a quotation here from the remarks of President Ewell, of the college, before the Committee on Education and Labor:

> Grant the prayers of petitions like this, and no more ever will the Union need arms to save people, or their families, or their schools, or their houses of charity and learning, or their houses of God from ravages of civil war. This mode of treating the wounds of the past would be a salve indeed and heal them.

This contains an appeal and a promise that could be made on behalf of every weak and crippled institution of learning in the land, of which there are many North and South.

I hope no threat is to be implied from this language in case we fail to pass this bill? I have no time to speak of the propriety or constitutionality of Congress healing the wounds of the South by voting away the money of the people under the name of "a healing salve."

As a benefaction in the cause of education we might, possibly, be justified in passing this bill, but that would be of doubtful constitutionality. My friend [Mr. TUCKER] from Virginia could hardly vote for this bill, with his views of the constitutional powers of Congress, if it is not to be regarded as a "war claim" resting upon some legal or constitutional grounds. Too many benefactions are now pressing upon us to make an exception of William and Mary College.

We should apply the bounty of the nation as a "salve" toward healing the yet open wounds of the living bodies possessed of souls before we can be magnanimous to the soulless corporate bodies. There are yet throughout this land many sorrowing, suffering, and bleeding hearts of widows and orphans of dead soldiers, and they are not confined to the North.

Another matter contained in the committee's report deserves mention. I read from the report:

> We believe that to follow the example of Washington, of Louis XVI, of Judge Cooke, of Tryon, will make every college in America safer if civil strife or foreign war should ever hereafter disturb our peace.

It must be again noted in passing that these are not examples in favor of paying for injury or destruction of institutions of learning in an enemy's country, but noble examples in favor of protecting them in war. Washington and Louis XVI only made private donations to repair damages done by their troops to colleges loyal to the cause in which they fought. There are those who believe that to refuse to pass this bill "will make every college in America safer," because its fate will be pointed to as a warning to other colleges not to encourage civil strife, insurrection, and war, much less to teach the divinity of human slavery. The committee are equally unfortunate in saying that "no gentleman need fear that a vote for this bill will furnish a dangerous precedent for large claims against the Treasury," and that "a careful inquiry has failed to develop evidence of injuries sustained in the late rebellion by endowed institutions of learning, exceeding in all the amount of $100,000."

A full list of such institutions, with the amount of claims for damages caused by the late war would be very large. Claims of this character have been presented to Congress for payment at different times since the late war, of which I give here only a partial list:

Alabama University	$250,000
William and Mary College, Virginia	65,000
Richmond Female Institute, Virginia	4,933
East Tennessee University	18,500
Jackson College, Tennessee	11,000
Alleghany College, West Virginia	8,000
Madison Female Academy, Richmond, Virginia	10,000
Male Academy, Athens, Georgia	5,000
Strawberry Plains High School, Tennessee	8,650
Protestant Episcopal Seminary, Virginia	20,000
Newberry College, South Carolina	15,000
La Grange College, Tennessee	34,300
Howard College, Alabama	5,000
Stewart College, Tennessee	4,000
Holstein College, Tennessee	6,250
Cane Hill College, Arkansas	10,000
Total	490,633

Most of these claims are now pending in this Congress. I am informed that members on this floor say they have been resisting the presentation of a flood of claims from their respective districts of kindred character to the above, which they will be no longer able to resist successfully if this bill passes. The Committee on Education and Labor of this House have already this Congress reported in favor of paying $85,000 of the above claims from Virginia alone, namely, the claims of William and Mary College and of the Protestant Episcopal Seminary. The claims in behalf of churches south are certainly more meritorious than the one under consideration. We are bound to presume that these churches of God upheld the banner of the Prince of Peace, and not of the demon of war.

There is a single claim in favor of the Book Agents' Publishing House, Methodist Episcopal Church South, now pending in the Senate, which amounts to $458,400. The claims on behalf of churches which have been presented to Congress exceed already $1,500,000. The committee's facts and law are equally bad.

The report is a "comedy of errors." Take another instance. The committee say, as a reason why members should vote for this bill, that—

> A bill like the present passed the Forty-second Congress, but was not reached in the Senate for want of time. It was received with expressions of approbation by the press of all parties, &c.

Certainly the draughtsman of the report did not intend to deceive or mislead any person by this statement. A bill such as the one under consideration, after amendment, was defeated in the Forty-second Congress by the House overwhelmingly. On the yeas and nays the vote stood—yeas 36, nays 127, not voting 78. (Globe, volume 92, page 188, December 13, 1872.) Nor did the bill receive the approbation of the press of all parties. In February, 1873, a bill similar to this one did pass the House by a small majority.

I conclude that on neither of the grounds set forth by the Committee on Education and Labor in their report can this House properly vote to pay this claim; nor can its payment be justified on any sound principle of law or true ground of national public policy or duty.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen from Ohio has seven minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. KEIFER. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois. [Mr. EDEN.]

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Chairman, I can say all that I wish to say on this bill in three minutes; and I am desirous to express briefly my views because I happen to be chairman of the Committee on War Claims, to which, as a general rule, claims of this class are referred.

I cannot vote for this bill; but my reasons for opposing it differ from those stated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER.] If this were the only claim of a similar character likely to arise out of the late civil war it is possible we might safely pass the bill; but if we adopt for the benefit of a particular college the rule that property destroyed in the course of military operations and on the theater of war must be paid for, then we must apply that rule in the case of all educational institutions; and I can see no reasons why we must not apply it also in the case of all church buildings and structures of a similar character. I think it is not safe for us to embark at all in the business of paying for damages committed by our armies upon the theater of active military operations. The damages thus inflicted were so enormous in amount that it would be utterly impossible to extend the rule so as to make reparation in all cases where injury of this character was suffered.

A brief paragraph from a report made by me upon a case somewhat similar to this will give all the reasons which will govern my vote in this case:

> We attach very great importance to this bill, not on account of the amount immediately involved, but because of the precedent it establishes. In the prosecution of a civil war through a period of four years, with armies aggregating a million men, and extending their operations over one-half the territory of the United States, great damage must of necessity have been done to private property, and payment for the injury in this case will be drawn into a precedent for payment in all other cases. All cases will not be precisely alike in detail; but when we open the door to the payment of claims for damages done to property by our armies in the prosecution of the war as is proposed to be done in this case, those which are to follow will be so nearly similar in principle that it will not be worth while to attempt to keep up the distinction.
> It may be said that in some instances the Government has paid for property destroyed by the Army in time of war. This is true. With equal truth it can be said that the Government has refused in many instances to pay damages in such cases. The rule seems to be that it is optional with the Government to pay or not to pay in such cases. Considering the enormous amount of money involved, we are of opinion that the best and safest rule for all concerned will be for the Government to adhere rigidly to the rule of non-payment of damages for destruction of and injury to property resulting from military operations during the war of the rebellion.

Mr. KEIFER. I reserve the four minutes remaining of my time to be used hereafter.

Mr. CONGER. At the request of some gentlemen, and on consultation, I will not occupy my hour to-night, but will yield to a motion that the committee rise, and will hold the floor when we go into committee again.

Mr. KEIFER. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to. The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BURCHARD reported that the Committee of the Whole House had, according to order, had under consideration the Private Calendar generally, and particularly a bill (H. R. No. 189) to reimburse the College of William and Mary, in Virginia, for property destroyed during the late war, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

MRS. ELIZABETH DAVIS.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, there is a bill on the Private Calender which I desire to have brought before the House and recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The reason for so doing is to enable the committee to consider some additional evidence. I move, therefore, that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2391) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Davis, and that the same be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. Not to come back on a motion to reconsider.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

ADMISSION OF CLERKS OF COMMITTEES TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. MACKEY, by unanimous consent, submitted a resolution to authorize the admission of the clerks of the several committees to the floor of the House during its session; which was referred to the Committee on Rules.

R. H. KREBS.

Mr. MACKEY also, by unanimous consent, submitted a resolution for the payment of R. H. Krebs for services in the Doorkeeper's department; which was referred to the Committee of Accounts.

GEN. GEORGE A. CUSTER.

Mr. McCOOK. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs and ask unanimous consent to report for present consideration a bill authorizing the donation of twenty condemned bronzed cannon, to aid in the erection of a monument to the memory of General George A. Custer at the Military Academy at West Point.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of War to deliver to the commandant of the United States Military Academy twenty condemned bronzed cannon, if the same can be spared without detriment to the public service, to be disposed of by him as he may see proper for the purpose of aiding in the erection of a monument to the memory of General George A. Custer on the grounds of the Military Academy at West Point.

Mr. POTTER. I wish to ask the gentleman who reports the bill a question. Have we made any appropriation for that monument?

Mr. McCOOK. No, sir; $10,000 are required to put up the statue. Of that amount about $6,000 have been raised by private subscription in the city of New York.

Mr. POTTER. And this is for the purpose of donating the bronze cannon?

Mr. McCOOK. Yes, sir; the bill gives twenty condemned cannon for the purpose of completing the monument.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 5532) authorizing the donation of twenty condemned bronze cannon to aid in the erection of a monument to the memory of General George A. Custer at the Military Academy at West Point was received, read three times, and passed.

Mr. McCOOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

Mr. HARRISON, by unanimous consent, presented a resolution of the Manufacturers' Association of the Northwest; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution is as follows:

> Whereas the communication addressed to this association by Hon. J. W. Foster, United States minister to the Republic of Mexico, contains statements that are biased and prejudiced and are at variance with the official reports of United States consuls at the several ports and stations of that republic, as published under the direction of the State Department of this Government, and in direct contradiction to the experience of well-known and responsible citizens of the United States who have resided in that country for many years; and

Whereas the commercial relations that our merchants and manufacturers are endeavoring to establish between the United States and Mexico require that the true condition of affairs in that country be fully known and thoroughly understood before investing money and time in such enterprises: Be it therefore

Resolved by the Manufacturers' Association of the Northwest, That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, respectfully memorialized to send a subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce of each House, respectively, to accompany an excursion party that purposes leaving this city for Mexico on the 4th day of January next, with instructions to investigate and report upon the practicability of establishing more direct and intimate commercial relations between the United States and the Republic of Mexico and to make such suggestions as the knowledge thus acquired may in their opinion be conducive to that end.

JAMES HAND.

Mr. CAMPBELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5533) granting a pension to James Hand; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. ATKINS, (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, December 14, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain; Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 1398) to amend sundry provisions of chapter 1, title 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to presidential elections, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

CORRECTION.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Yesterday the bill (S. No. 753) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims. Afterward, by unanimous consent of House, the order was revoked. The RECORD shows the reference, but not the revocation of the reference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recollects very distinctly it was revoked. The Journal shows it.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. The Journal does, but the RECORD does not.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

MANHATTAN SAVINGS INSTITUTION.

Mr. WOOD. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 1460) to authorize the issue of certain duplicate registered bonds for the benefit of the Manhattan Savings Institution.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to issue duplicates of the hereinafter-described bonds of the United States, alleged to have been stolen from the Manhattan Savings Institution of New York City, on the 27th of October, 1878, upon evidence clear and satisfactory to him being furnished that they have not been assigned, but are still the property of said institution, and upon the condition that a sufficient number of these duplicate bonds be issued to the Treasurer of the United States in trust for the said Manhattan Savings Institution, to be by him held for such time as, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, will secure the Treasurer of the United States against loss.

Mr. CONGER. I do not know whether an objection will lie against the present consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. It will. The bill can only come before the House by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONGER. Unless there can be some amendment to the bill, making this bank give some guarantee to the Government against any loss, as is usual in such cases, I must object.

Mr. WOOD. If the gentleman will permit me a few words——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan consent to the gentleman from New York making an explanation, reserving his right to object?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOOD. This bill provides that the Treasury Department may issue duplicate registered bonds to the Manhattan Savings Bank of New York, which was entered in October last by burglars who possessed themselves of access to the safe and carried off a large amount of securities, and, among others, some $1,300,000 of registered bonds. These bonds have not yet been restored to this institution, which is a benevolent one; but they are registered here in the Treasury Department, and of course can be of no service to the parties who may have stolen them. Now, the law requires that sureties in double the amount of the bonds shall be given to the Department before the bonds may be issued. To do so in this case would require the trustees of the institution to furnish bonds of between two and a half and three millions of dollars, which would be almost impossible for them to do. This law proposes that the Treasury Department shall issue duplicates, that these duplicates shall remain in the hands of the Government until a certain time has elapsed, so as to render it impossible that there can be any possible loss to the Government growing out of these bonds.

The bill is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. It was unanimously reported from the Committee on Finance of the Senate by the Senator from Vermont, Mr. MORRILL. Yesterday morning it was unanimously passed by the Senate. It was referred yesterday to the Committee of Ways and Means of this House and unanimously passed by that committee. There is a necessity for the passage of this bill before the holiday vacation, or else it may result in the bankruptcy of this institution, simply growing out of the loss of these bonds. I am sure under these circumstances no gentleman can object to the passage of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] a question. Are all these bonds registered bonds?

Mr. WOOD. Every one of them; every bond to which this bill relates is a registered bond. Otherwise, there would be no necessity of coming here.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the bill is right.

Mr. CONGER. One word more. I understood the gentleman from New York to say that these bonds after reissue were to remain in the Treasury for a sufficient length of time. I understood the bill as read to leave it to the discretion of an officer of the Treasury when he should issue them.

Mr. WOOD. It leaves it to the discretion of the Treasury Department. The Secretary of the Treasury of course would be responsible. In the mean time these bonds are simply duplicated, and the duplicates are issued to the Treasurer of the United States in trust for the Manhattan Savings Institution.

Mr. CONGER. I had an impression that a portion of these bonds were not registered bonds——

Mr. WOOD. Not one of them.

Mr. CONGER. And would be valid in the hands of the holder.

Mr. WOOD. None of those provided for in this bill.

Mr. CONGER. And I knew that in such cases as that the rule in this House had always been to require individuals or corporations to give proper indemnity bonds to the Government against any chance of loss.

Mr. WOOD. These are all registered bonds.

Mr. CONGER. It was in reference to that question that I raised the point. I thought that a bill for some million and a half of dollars ought not to pass without that security. If I am mistaken in the supposition that some of these bonds were not registered bonds, n that case I would not make objection.

The SPEAKER. As this is an important bill it would be better that it should be read again.

The bill was again read.

Mr. CONGER. I am unable to see from the reading of the bill that all these bonds are registered bonds.

Mr. WOOD. It so states.

Mr. CONGER. It might be well, then, to provide that this bill shall apply only to registered bonds.

Mr. WOOD. Every designation of bonds in the bill states that they are registered bonds standing in the name of the Manhattan Savings Institution of New York.

Mr. KELLEY. That is so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will reserve the point of order.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to assign a reason or two why this bill should be passed immediately. It is suggested by some gentlemen near me that this is a private bill and should go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. If such a step, or any other that involves long delay, be taken, then the managers of this institution will be driven to a selection between two alternatives: the closing up of a savings bank in which the deposits amount to about $13,000,000, or the authorizing of certain policemen or agents to negotiate the repurchase of their property by rewarding the most flagrant burglary probably that was ever perpetrated, even in New York, by the payment of a large sum of money.

To refuse, therefore, to enable these gentlemen to take advantage of the right of Congress and of the Treasury to circumvent the burglaries by issuing duplicate bonds, thus rendering those they stole valueless from the moment this bill shall pass, is to make this House, the Senate already having passed the bill, an accomplice with the thieves in their game of extortion. That is the whole of it.

No injustice to the amount of a cent can result to the Government. Every bond is registered; no one of them can be transferred except at the Treasury of the United States. To refuse to give this protection against so desperate a band of burglars will be held by the community as becoming their accomplices.

The SPEAKER. Is there any further objection to the consideration of this bill at this time?

There was no objection.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WOOD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5534) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPARKS. I desire to give notice that on Tuesday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, I will ask the House to proceed to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. MILLS. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The points of order will be reserved.

Mr. KNOTT. I wish the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] for a moment.

Mr. SPARKS. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. KNOTT. I will suggest to him to name Wednesday instead of Tuesday.

Mr. SPARKS. Why so?

Mr. KNOTT. Because it will probably take two hours of Tuesday to dispose of the pending Geneva award bill.

Mr. SPARKS. Then, I will name Wednesday.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DURHAM. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back, with the amendments of the Senate, the bill (H. R. No. 5230) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes. The committee have considered these amendments, and beg leave to submit a report recommending concurrence in the amendment numbered 6, and non-concurrence in the amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, and 9.

The sixth amendment was read, as follows:

Insert the following: "For safe for disbursing officer's office, $300."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DURHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The remaining amendments were read, as follows:

In line 5, page 1, strike out "two" and insert "four;" so as to make the clause read: "For pay of four professors, at $3,500 per annum each."

In line 6, page 1, strike out "seven" and insert "fourteen;" so that, if amended, the clause will read: "For pay for four professors, at $3,500 per annum each, $14,000."

In line seven, page 1, strike out "seven" and insert "five;" so that, if amended, the clause will read: "For pay of five professors, at $3,000 per annum."

In line 8, page 1, strike out "twenty-one" and insert "fifteen;" so that, if amended, the clause will read: "For pay of five professors, at $3,000 per annum each, $15,000."

After line 18, page 3, insert: "For clerk to treasurer, $1,200."

In lines 15 and 16, on page 4, after the word "dollars," insert: "For illustrating the science of electricity as applied to the useful arts, $3,000."

In line 16, page 4, strike out "one" and insert "four."

The amendments were not concurred in.

Mr. DURHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to concur; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PURCHASE OF FREEDMAN'S BANK BUILDING.

Mr. DURHAM. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Appropriations the bill (S. No. 557) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase certain property of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company for the use of the United States, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which there will be opportunity for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase for the use of the United States all those lots and parcels of ground, with the buildings and improvements thereon, situated in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, on Pennsylvania avenue, between Fifteenth and Fifteenth-and-a-half streets, and belonging to the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, at a sum not exceeding $275,000, to be paid and by him placed to the credit of the commissioners of the said Freedman's Savings and Trust Company on the books of the Treasurer of the United States, for distribution among its creditors, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, upon proof of a perfect title and the execution to the United States of a deed good and sufficient in law, and in form approved by the Attorney-General; and said sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for that purpose.

SEC. 2. The further sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of fitting up the rooms upon the first floor of the fire-proof building upon said premises known as the Freedman's Bank building, under the direction of the supervising architect of the Capitol, for the use of the Court of Claims, and the removal of it and its records and papers thereto.

The Clerk was proceeding to read the report of the Committee on Appropriations upon the bill, when

Mr. EDEN said: I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the bill is not before the House.

INDIAN OUTRAGES IN KANSAS AND NEBRASKA.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask unanimous consent to offer for immediate consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas a band of wild Indians of the plains, under the care of the Department of the Interior, somewhere in the Indian Territory, broke away from their reservation during the past summer and made a raid through the settlements of Kansas and Nebraska, murdering in the western settlements of Kansas some thirty or forty persons and committing brutal outrages on helpless women and children; and

Whereas said Indians were captured by the military, and are held or are likely to be sent back to the point from which they escaped: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish this House information whether he has surrendered the guilty or responsible parties of such band or bands to the proper authorities of Kansas and Nebraska, to be tried by the tribunals that have competent jurisdiction, to the end that there be law on the frontier.

Mr. BURCHARD. I suggest that the gentleman insert after the word "whereas" the words "it is alleged." We do not know the facts recited in the preamble.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Very well: let that modification be made. I will state that there is a doubt as to what course will be taken by the Secretary of the Interior. I wish, if it should become necessary, to introduce legislation on the subject into this House.

Mr. CONGER. I believe the resolution declares that these Indians are in the possession of the Army.

Mr. PHILLIPS. No, sir; it does not say that they are in possession of the Army. They are not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the resolution?

Mr. CONGER. I think it is a very harmless resolution and am entirely willing it should be adopted.

The resolution was adopted.

CIRCUIT COURT WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5535) changing the time of holding the terms of the United States circuit court for the district of West Virginia; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. What disposition does the gentleman propose to make of the bill?

Mr. WILSON. I desire its present consideration.

The bill, which was read, provides that hereafter the circuit court of the United States for the district of West Virginia shall be held at Parkersburgh on the 10th day of January and of June, and when either of said days shall fall on Sunday the terms shall commence on the following Monday; and all pending cases, process, rules, and proceedings shall be conducted in the same manner and with the same effect as to time as if the act had not been passed.

Mr. EDEN. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from West Virginia whether that increases the number of the terms of the court?

Mr. WILSON. It does not. It is the only time it can be arranged. This court is held by Judge Bond, and there are several States in his circuit. This is the only time he can hold terms of court in West Virginia with a view to his arrangement in other States, and I hope there will be no objection to his being accommodated.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEW LONDON NAVY-YARD.

Mr. WAIT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5536) making an appropriation for continuing the work on the New London navy-yard, in the State of Connecticut; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN W. DOUGLASS.

Mr. BURCHARD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back favorably the bill (S. No. 55) for the relief of John W. Douglass; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to call for the regular order, and I will state that my object in calling for the regular order of business is that some time or other we may reach the call of committees for reports.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business will be the Geneva award bill, and would not be a morning hour for the consideration of reports for committees.

Mr. PAGE. My object is to get to the reports of committees as soon as possible.

The SPEAKER. The question of consideration can be raised against the Geneva award bill, and if the House refuses to go on with the unfinished business, the next business in order will be the morning hour for reports from committees.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from California to withdraw his demand for the regular order of business in order that I may introduce a bill.

Mr. PAGE. I withdraw the demand for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have to recognize the gentleman from Mississippi who is on the floor with a report from the Committee on Printing.

DISTRIBUTION OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the Committee on Printing, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 206) providing for the distribution of the Revised Statutes to the Post-Office Department; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that out of the 15,000 copies of the new edition of the first volume of the Revised Statutes of the United States required by the fourth section of the act to provide for the preparation and publication of a new edition of the Revised Statutes of the United States, approved March 2, 1877, to be printed and bound, the Secretary of State shall furnish to the Post-Office Department, upon the requisition of the Postmaster-General, not exceeding 250 copies for the use of the officers and special agents of the Department and of postmasters at offices of free delivery; no provision having been made for the Post-Office Department in the joint resolution providing for the distribution and sale of the new edition of the Revised Statutes of the United States, approved May 22, 1878.

Mr. SINGLETON. I ask that the letter from the Postmaster-General be read, as it will fully explain the reason for this joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., December 5, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that no provision has been made for supplying this Department with copies of the new edition of the Revised Statutes, and to inclose herewith draught of a resolution for that purpose, with the request that you will bring the same to the attention of your committee and of the House of Representatives.

Very respectfully,

D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. O. R. SINGLETON,
Chairman Committee on Printing, House of Representatives.

Mr. SINGLETON. This is to supply an omission in the law providing for the distribution of the new edition of the Revised Statutes.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WYATT PARISH.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5537) granting a pension to Wyatt Parish, late a private in Captain James Bowman's company in Colonel John DeMint's battalion, in the Black Hawk war; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

GENEVA AWARD.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes as the regular order the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4553) to provide for the further distribution of the moneys received under the Geneva award. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is recognized.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, the subject under discussion is probably as important as any that has been before the House this session or will be, and its consideration ought to demand the attention of every member. It would have been agreeable to me if I could have prepared with care and deliberation a written argument touching the profound questions of law, of diplomacy, of history which arise in this case and have been so ably presented and will be so ably presented by other gentlemen on this floor. I purposed to do so; but it seemed to me on hearing the arguments made, and learning the scope of those that would follow, that it was my duty to forget reputation; to forget that the speech which I should make would be sent out to the world in the RECORD; to forget that I might with care and deliberation gain to myself some credit; to forget all these things and to bring the attention of the House down to certain practical questions with which I have been familiar from my long experience in this very case which is now under discussion.

For six years, sir, this case has been partially within my charge and care. I have spent more than one year of solid work upon the Geneva award and upon the question of how it should be distributed. A year's time I have devoted to it, and yet to-day I hold it to be my duty simply to confine myself to those questions which other gentlemen will neglect, which other gentlemen will forget, because in the discussion of them there is no reputation to be gained, and there is certain attack to be suffered and endured. Sir, I can endure the attack, because it has been made upon me again and again by every insurance-company lobbyist who has taken advantage of his rights under the rules of this House and lobbied for insurance companies on this floor. I can endure the assaults of the press hired by the insurance companies to attack gentlemen who differ from them in the view they take. I can stand the assaults of gentlemen on the floor of the House, like the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WILLIS,] who declares that it is impudence without parallel for any gentleman in in this discussion to undertake to inquire into the business of insurance companies, their losses, and their profits.

Sir, it is my duty to inquire into the business of insurance companies. I hold to the doctrine that this nation proceeded against Great Britain as a nation; that there was no claimant before that tribunal except the great claimant of the United States of America; that these insurance companies and these private claimants were there as witnesses and witnesses only, so that from their testimony that tribunal might find some measure of damages; that having listened to their testimony and having rendered an award of fifteen and one-half millions of dollars, that money is to-day in the Treasury of the United States, not in trust, as the gentleman from New York says, for insurance-companies or private claimants, but is in the possession of the United States under no legal obligation to give it out anywhere on earth, but under the highest and deepest moral obligation to pay it to those who suffered from the wrongs inflicted upon this country by Great Britain.

Holding, Mr. Speaker, to that view it becomes my duty to inquire into the business of insurance companies because they are the first, the most persistent, the most audacious claimants for this fund to-day before the Congress of the United States; and, sir, they have prevailed upon the majority of the Judiciary Committee to report to this House a bill which should be entitled "a bill for the relief of insurance companies," because it is a bill that gives no relief to any person on earth except these companies. And, sir, I call the attention of the House to the fact that it gives relief to the British insurance companies precisely as it gives relief to our own. Those English insurance companies, taking advantage of their own country's wrong to us in a time of war, made millions of dollars out of our poor shipowners and importers of merchandise; and the majority of the Judiciary Committee has reported a bill which shall afford them the relief which they seek; and to-day they have powers of attorney in the hands of New York lawyers to enforce those claims provided this bill passes. It may not be known to all gentlemen that the insurance companies of England did a large business in these war risks. Every shipper of grain from the port of New York to the port of Liverpool was insured in English insurance companies, because the shipper desired to draw in advance, and the only way he could do it was to telegraph the insurance in an English company in which the consignee had confidence and would advance upon the bill of lading.

Again, sir, I desire to say that no other person can recover one single dollar under the majority bill presented by the Judiciary Committee referring the question to the Court of Claims. The insurance companies hope to recover under the doctrine of subrogation, by technical rules of law; and no other person whatever has or ought to have any hope of recovery under this bill. So it is a bill for the relief of insurance companies and for the relief of no one else.

Mr. KELLEY. For the further emolument of insurance companies.

Mr. FRYE. I shall come to that by and bye.

Now, sir, it is a square dead fight between the insurance companies of Great Britain and America and every man who lost a dollar outside of them by reason of these English cruisers; and it has been so for the three Congresses in which I have served on the Judiciary Committee. Why, sir, in the Forty-second Congress, when the matter came before the Senate of the United States, Mr. CONKLING, in behalf of the insurance companies of New York, offered an amendment, the effect of which would have been to have allowed them to recover their losses. That was voted down in the Senate after discussion by a vote of 30 to 18. The House bill to pay losses by inculpated cruisers and war premiums excluded insurance companies except they showed a net loss.

A distinguished gentleman and member of this House from New York then, as he is a distinguished member of the present House, [Mr. POTTER,] offered a motion in the House to strike out that exclusion of insurance companies. It was discussed, and giants, sir, not pigmies, took part in the discussion in favor of the companies. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] the gentleman from New York, Mr. Tremaine, and the gentleman from Vermont, Mr. Poland, no three more powerful gentlemen in argument could have been found in this country than were those three. That motion of Mr. POTTER was discussed, and it was defeated by a vote of 37 ayes and 157 noes; a deliberate judgment of this House, after discussion, against these insurance companies.

Then came the white-haired man from Vermont, Mr. Poland, and he put in a specious sophistical disguised court bill, the bill which the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary have now reported, and labeled a bill to refer all claims to the court; and Judge Poland did everything in his power to commend it to the House. There were about thirty members then who thought the money should be covered into the Treasury of the United States, and they joined with those members who were in favor of the insurance companies; but Judge Poland's bill was defeated by an aye vote of 63 and a nay vote of 125.

The House then by a two-third vote substituted its own bill for the Senate bill to pay for the losses caused by the inculpated cruisers, and to pay also the war-premium claims.

Again, in the Forty-third Congress the old insurance lobby was here in full force and full power. A bill passed the Senate to pay losses by inculpated cruisers. The Judiciary Committee of the House reported a substitute paying losses caused by both inculpated and exculpated cruisers and also reported in favor of paying the mutual insurance companies. When that bill came before the House I made a motion to strike out the mutual insurance companies. That motion was discussed on the floor of the House, so that every man understood it, and when the question was taken upon it the ayes were 137; the noes were too insignificant to count.

Mr. Poland again presented his now famous court bill; it was rejected—ayes 94, noes 149. The House bill passed by a majority of 31. There was a conference, and I was on the conference committee. Finally we agreed practically to the Senate bill providing that further distribution of the fund should be left to the Congress of the United States, not to the courts of the United States.

Again, in the Forty-fourth Congress they came, not disturbed, not frightened, their patience not worn out, although up to that time these insurance companies had never got but 35 votes in this House. They came here not discouraged, I say; in spite of that, they came again to the Forty-fourth Congress, and the Judiciary Committee reported a bill providing for paying losses caused by the exculpated cruisers; also war-premium claims, and excluding insurance companies except they show a net loss from their business.

The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. KNOTT,] surely a gentleman of influence and weight and power in this House, and deservedly so, moved to strike out the clause excluding insurance companies from the bill. That was discussed and the motion was defeated by ayes 35, noes 151; and the bill as reported from the Committee on the Judiciary passed the House. No action was taken upon it in the Senate on account of complications that we were under at that time.

Now they have come into the Forty-fifth Congress with the same demand. Up to the commencement of this Congress there had been three subcommittees of the Committee on the Judiciary, each one made up of lawyers, and each one devoting a solid month of time to a careful examination and discussion of this case. During all that time I say these insurance companies had been defeated before the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee. Then when the subcommittee reported to the full committee they had been defeated every time before the full committee.

In the Forty-fifth Congress for the first time they have carried a majority of the Judiciary Committee by one. The subcommittee appointed by the chairman, after a careful, labored, diligent search for the right in this matter, by a majority, determined against these insurance companies and in favor of the minority bill. But that subcommittee was overruled by the Judiciary Committee itself, and, as I said, by a majority of one these insurance companies have finally triumphed in the Judiciary Committee.

The question now comes, Shall their triumph be a lasting one? Shall this House affirm the verdict of the majority of this Judiciary Committee or shall it affirm the verdict of every other House that has sat here since this matter has come under discussion, and a verdict of every other House by an immense majority?

Did I not well say, Mr. Speaker, that it was well for me to look into the rights of the insurance companies? Why should an insurance company recover if it lost nothing? Under the bill of the Forty-third Congress every insurance company in this country that had suffered a loss by reason of its business of taking war risks has recovered the amount of that loss and has put the money into its coffers. To-day they say to us that we have no right to pay losses by exculpated cruisers. Yet they under that law recovered for losses caused by exculpated cruisers equally with losses caused by inculpated cruisers.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Did they not also recover interest as well?

Mr. FRYE. They did. To-day they affirm on the floor of this House that we have no right to pay a war-premium man, while under that law they recovered for the war premiums which they paid to other insurance companies to take their risks off their hands.

To-day they say there is no distinction to be made between inculpated and exculpated cruisers, no distinction to be made against war premiums paid when they themselves go before the courts we created. Here in Congress we are robbers, we are doing gross injustice, and Mr. Lathers, a distinguished insurance lobbyist——

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. I object to my friend calling Mr. Lathers a "lobbyist." He has never accepted anything for his services in this matter. He is a gentleman of integrity, the peer of the gentleman from Maine and every other gentleman on this floor. He should not be assailed where he cannot defend himself. If he was here to defend himself he would be quite competent to do so.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, it is a little remarkable that a gentleman of this House should fly into such a passion——

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. Not at all.

Mr. FRYE. Because an insurance attorney is only named here.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. He is not an attorney. He is a gentleman personally interested.

Mr. FRYE. May not an insurance attorney be a gentleman? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. Undoubtedly, but I am stating the facts as to Mr. Lathers.

Mr. FRYE. Did he not write an argument in this case?

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. He did, and one which you will find it impossible to answer.

Mr. FRYE. Well, I will try before I get through. Now, Mr. Speaker, that gentleman, who is represented by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS]——

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. No, sir.

Mr. FRYE. Defended by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. That is right. I want the gentleman to be accurate.

Mr. FRYE. This gentleman, Mr. Lathers, took occasion to call us who differed from him exceedingly hard and wicked names. We were without breadth and without depth, without reason and without justice, because one hundred and fifty-one of us thought the insurance companies ought not to recover from this fund, while thirty-five wise, distinguished, virtuous gentlemen, lovers of justice, thought the other way! Eleven obstinate jurors could not be brought to agree with the one honest, fair-minded man!

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. I said I wanted the question settled according to justice, equity, and the law of nations.

Mr. FRYE. Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] insists that the Government of the United States became an agent of these insurance companies. Oh, to what a depth, then, has our great country fallen! An insurance agent! Let it beware how it adopts this new, and to it untried, business. Several distinguished gentlemen, during the last few years involved in its intricate mazes, have retired to the quiet repose of prison life. Our Government may perhaps become accessory to crime after the fact. [Laughter.]

The Government of the United States, controlling forty-five millions of people, is the agent of the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company of New York! [Laughter.] The agent for what purpose? The agent of the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company to recover of Great Britain millions of dollars, to be paid into the coffers of that company, which had already ground six million dollars from the poor shipowners and importers of the United States trying to sail their ships under the American flag.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. As the gentleman addresses his remark to me I will say to him he is mistaken.

Mr. FRYE. Mistaken in what?

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. Mistaken in the statement that this company had extorted $6,000,000.

Mr. FRYE. Did they not make $6,000,000?

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. No, sir; these were mutual companies; their profits were divided. What the gentleman states as their profits were nothing but assets held for payment of losses or distribution among those who had paid premiums.

Mr. FRYE. I will come to that point. The Government of the United States is, like Mr. Lathers, the agent of an insurance company! This company calls upon the President of the United States and tells him that in a message to be delivered to forty-five million people he must call the attention of the world to these claims of that insurance company and demand of Great Britain that they shall be paid. Ay, more, that he shall advise the Congress of the United States to have these claims purchased, and then compel Great Britain to pay them back. Ay, more, it requires the great United States of America, as agents of insurance companies, to levy contributions on all the diplomatic powers of the country. Ay, more, it demands that the United States should call upon the Senate of the United States, the treaty-making power, to make treaties for the protection of their clients, the insurance companies. Ay, more, this Government, if Great Britain refused, was bound as the agent of these companies to declare war, fit out navies, raise up armies, spend millions upon millions of dollars and sacrifice hundreds of thousands of lives to collect the claims of their clients!

Agents of insurance companies! The idea is utterly absurd and revolting. If the United States were the agents of insurance companies they were agents also of war-premium men; were they not? They had in their charge the claims of war-premium men. If agents of insurance companies, they were agents also of the men who lost by exculpated cruisers. And if the Government of the United States as the agent of the men who lost by exculpated cruisers gave up the claims of their client in order to establish a precedent and a rule of law, then, in the name of Heaven, is not the Government of the United States responsible to that client to-day?

If the United States as agent of the war-premium men, as these gentlemen assert, yielded the claims of the war-premium men for the sake of establishing rules between two great nations, is not the United States to-day holden to the war-premium men to pay them those claims?

But there was no agency, no agency for anybody, no agency for any company. The United States had been insulted. The United States in its dignity as a country had been trifled with, had been attacked through itself and through its people, and in the capacity of a great Government had made its demand upon another great government and recovered an award; not for insurance companies, not for war-premium men, not for the men who lost by exculpated cruisers; no; but for itself, to do whatever it pleased with it; and we expect the Government through the Congress to be governed in the distribution of that fund by moral obligations alone and not by law, for there is no law in it.

But there is the other gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] and that is their only hope in a court bill, who holds that the insurance companies are subrogated, subrogated to all the rights of the insured, and hence in law they are entitled to recover from this fund and will recover under the bill which has been reported. This distinguished gentleman from New York to my left [Mr. WILLIS] calls it spes recuperandi, and for the benefit of the ignorant men on the floor I am glad to see he translated it. [Laughter.] But it is the doctrine of subrogation. No lawyer on the earth denies the doctrine that the underwriters, in case the ship is lost or abandoned, undoubtedly, paying the loss, is entitled to recover to himself all that is left of the timbers of the ship or the cargo.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. Or what is recovered from the justice of foreign states, as in this case.

Mr. FRYE. I never heard such a doctrine in my life. Again, he is entitled to recover whatever can be recovered in a court of law against any trespasser who destroyed that ship or that cargo. Now, that is all he is entitled to. He is entitled to the balance of the timbers of the ship and the balance of the cargo, and he is entitled to the right of action against any wrong-doer who caused the destruction of the ship. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the timbers our confederate friends left of our ships captured by them. [Laughter.] His insurance companies may have the old hulks. They may send their divers down and bring them up.

Have they any claim against the men who caused the destruction? If they have, that can be enforced. If Raphael Semmes was a pirate, then these insurance companies have their remedies in the courts of the United States, if he were alive, to recover from any of his officers and from any of his crew or from the men who sent them there. They have a right, and a legal right, to recover for the destruction of those ships. But is there any such right? Why, it seems to me we were taught there was not by a pretty serious lesson. We took the Savannah, a privateer, early in the war, and the cry went out all over the North and all over the West that we should hang the officers and crew as pirates; and we sent them to New York and we called together a jury and we tried them as pirates and the jury disagreed, and the civilized world heard of what we were doing in America and they sent out in trumpet tones their protest. It was discussed in the French Assembly; it was discussed in the Parliament of Great Britain. It was urged there: "We have accorded belligerent rights to these gentlemen in the South whom you say are in rebellion. These men on those cruisers are commissioned officers, are acting under authority. You must treat them as prisoners of war; you cannot and dare not hang them as pirates." The North and the West quivered with excitement for their hanging, but in less than a month's time you could not have heard a whisper in the North or in the West that they should be treated any other way than as prisoners of war.

If, sir, they were prisoners of war and entitled to the treatment of prisoners of war, then a ship-owner whose ships they destroyed had no right of action which he could maintain in any court in this country for a single moment. If no right of action could be maintained, then there was no subrogation. You cannot subrogate to a mere gratuity. There is no such law, and no gentleman on this floor can find any. So much for the great doctrine of subrogation which is so attractive to every lawyer who only looks at the face of this case.

Well, then, they have another specious plea which they make; the gentleman hinted at it a moment ago. My friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] inquires of me whether I do not hold they might have brought and maintained suit against Great Britain. Yes, they might; if the Government of the United States would have been willing to have acted as their agent and raised armies and navies and overawed the courts of Great Britain, ultimately they might have recovered, but I think not otherwise. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from New York hinted a moment ago at one of their specious pleas and a taking one. It is this: These are mutual companies. The New York Times very kindly came in to the aid of these insurance companies, and the metropolitan press is very liable to do it. I have noticed it heretofore. Why, I do not know, but I can guess. These mutual insurance companies say they are gentlemen, ship-owners, importers, who come together making up a pool, and in making up that pool they insure each other against loss. At the end of the year, if there has been no loss, each gentleman steps up and takes out the share of the pool he put in, less office expense. If there has been a loss of $50,000 that loss is charged against the pool, and then at the end of the year each gentleman takes his share of the balance. Now that is a mutual insurance company, and they say to you, gentlemen——

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. Perhaps the gentleman will oblige us by accounting for the New England press also.

Mr. FRYE. They are all the other way. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. Yes, all the other way. It is New England versus the rest of the country. [Laughter.]

Mr. FRYE. The Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company is not located in New England.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. No; happily it is not.

Mr. FRYE. Now they say, that being so, the true way for Congress to do is this: "Pay the money to us; we will pay it out to the war-premium men who paid in the war premiums to us." They wanted to make us agree to that. So they went to work in 1873 and got the New York Assembly to pass a law, and immediately on its passage they brought it here. I should say there were a dozen New York lobbyists and insurance lawyers came with it.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. How many from New England?

Mr. FRYE. If the gentleman will please not interrupt I will proceed. I do not like to see the "galled jade wince" so much.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. I only want the House to know both sides of the case.

Mr. FRYE. They brought that law along here—about a dozen of them—and represented to the Judiciary Committee: "See how honest we are; you see we mean to pay it out to the men who paid it in, the very men you are fighting for." What is that law which passed in 1873? Here it is:

CHAPTER 614.

An act to authorize marine insurance companies to declare extra dividends in certain cases, passed May 24, 1873.

The people of the State of New York, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. If any marine insurance company, organized under the laws of this State, having paid a loss, shall receive a sum derived from the Geneva award, by way of reimbursement of that loss, it shall be lawful for such company to divide the net amount so received, after deducting the expenses and liabilities relating hereto, among the persons or parties who paid premiums and suffered by the payment of the original loss, &c.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Did you ever know them to divide?

Mr. FRYE. Oh, yes; I have known receivers to divide between themselves and the lawyers. [Laughter.]

Now notice, gentlemen, this was done to impose upon a dignified body like the Judiciary Committee. "Shall be lawful," mind you. It does not say they "shall" do it. Oh, no; they are too witty and wise for that. They did not go to the New York assembly and get it to pass a law compelling them to pay the money out to the war-premium men who paid it in. But they went and got a law passed declaring it should be lawful for them to do it if they wanted to. Imagine the "Atlantic Mutual"—oh, no! imagine the Columbian Mutual wanting to pay out to the war-premium men!

Now, the war-premium men say, "No, thank you; we do not care to have these insurance companies take our money and pay it out to us." Why? I will tell you why. I am going to take the case of the Columbian Insurance Company in order to tell you why. The Columbian Mutual Insurance Company was organized in 1857. The figures I am about to give are taken from its annual reports. War risks served the company well. In January, 1864, they reported assets $3,140,930 made out of their war-premium business; and in 1860 the excess of losses over gains was $86,000. Between that time and 1864 they made, as I say, over $3,000,000. After reserving for estimated claims unadjusted and other contingencies $441,206, they left a profit to be divided of $695,974.52. And in 1866 they failed. Why? They failed because the war stopped. So long as they were doing a war-premium business they were solvent; in the four years they made three and a half millions. From 1864 up to 1866 they managed somehow or other to lose every dollar of it and failed. Now I know a gentleman in the eastern part of Maine whose ship was insured in the Columbian Mutual Insurance Company and it was burned by an inculpated cruiser, and then he called upon the company to pay. It refused. Action was brought and judgment recovered, but a week before judgment was recovered that Columbian company failed.

Mr. KELLEY. Having divided its assets, probably, among its members.

Mr. FRYE. Yes; having probably divided its assets, it failed; and, as near as I can learn, not over $400,000 of assets ever went into the hands of the receivers appointed by the court. What did they do with the $400,000? They paid 5 per cent. of the loss of my friend in Maine. They paid 5 per cent. on their losses. What became of the balance? I saw an official statement made by them. I could not find it among my papers; I will not say I remember it distinctly, but my impression is that that official statement showed that they paid New York lawyers $150,000 counsel fees—David Dudley Field at the head. What did they do with the rest? Nobody knows what these receivers did with the rest; but these poor ship-owners who lost their ships and got 5 per cent. from the Columbian company have pooled together and brought suit against the receivers in the city of New York to compel them to disgorge. Whether they will disgorge or not Heaven only knows; I do not.

Now these gentlemen say this Columbian company has a claim here of about $1,000,000; interest and all, a little over $1,000,000. And these gentlemen say, "Look at this admirable mutual insurance company, made up of pool-holders, and, as the Times says, of 'subscribers;' pay over this million of dollars to the receivers of the Columbian Insurance Company, and they will pay it out to you ship-owners and you cargo-owners who paid the war premiums to them." Only think of it. Is it not strange that the ship-owners and the war-premium men should object to any such guardian as the Columbian Insurance Company? Would they not have to pool together to bring suit once more against the receivers of that company in New York to see if they could make them disgorge a hundred or two thousands of this one million?

But they say this Atlantic Insurance Company is a model mutual insurance company, is a strictly mutual insurance company. Now, let me read two or three sections from the insurance laws of the State of New York and certain articles of the by-laws of the company. I have them here taken from its reports. First, a brief history.

In 1824 the Atlantic Insurance Company, a stock concern, was chartered and organized, did business for eighteen years, paid a net profit of 350 per cent. on its original capital—a remarkable success—and yet in 1842 it adopted the mutual plan. What was its motive? Certainly not charity. An examination of its charter and the insurance laws of New York will show. Twenty-one of the original stockholders obtained the charter. In examining this, I take an abstract made by Mr. Moore, of San Francisco, whose direct and indirect losses ruined him, and who died seeking his rights of Congress:

Section 10 provides that policy-holders on risks not marked off, upon which the premium is not less than $100, shall be entitled to one vote for each $100 of such premium until the outstanding scrip of the company shall amount to $500,000.

Section 11 provides that scripholders to the amount of $100, issued in the name of such holders, shall be entitled to one vote for each $100 of such scrip.

Section 13 provides that "annual dividend statements shall be made, which shall contain a fair estimate of the net profits of the company not before divided, up to and including the last day of each year, taking into view the probable amount to be paid on all claims and demands which have been or may be made against the company." After ascertaining in this mode the net profits of each period on risks marked off, the board of trustees may declare a dividend, and the officers of the company may issue certificates of a certain percentage on the premiums received for such marked-off risks, to the persons in whose names the policy of insurance was originally made, or to their representative.

Section 19 provides that the trustees of the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company may take from themselves, as stockholders in the Atlantic Insurance Company, one-half of the stock and assets of the latter company, on such terms and for such periods as they can agree with themselves, and pay legal interest thereon, and authorizes them to appropriate and pay profits thereon pro rata upon the amounts received, with the premium subsequently earned.

Section 13 declares the amounts named in the scrip certificates to be conclusive, whether accepted or not. Persons entitled to such scrip can, therefore, have no claims upon the surplus earnings. It also declares that such scrip shall be percentage on the premiums received, thereby excluding policy-holders from participating in the interest derived from the large amount of invested capital.

Section 1 permits any mutual marine insurance company then existing, or that might thereafter be chartered by the Legislature, or be incorporated under any general law of the State of New York to create or unite with its existing funds a cash capital of not less than $300,000, to be divided into shares of $100 each.

Section 2 provides for payment of 7 per cent. interest on such capital, and permits the payment to the holders of stock capital, in cash, one-third of all the net profits of the business, the other two-thirds of net profit to be paid in scrip to persons entitled by the charter or articles of association to participate in its profits.

Section 4 provides that holders of cash capital or stock shall be entitled to one vote, at all elections, for each share of stock; that no person shall be entitled to vote at any election by reason of holding either policies of insurance or certificates of scrip, thereby annulling sections 10 and 11 of the charter of the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company and depriving policy and scrip holders of all mutual marine insurance companies of membership, making scripholders simply creditors of the companies and their claims subject to be canceled at the discretion of a board of trustees, in whose election they have no voice.

This is that model company of merchants contributing to a pool. See, now, how successfully it operated.

The Atlantic Mutual was organized in 1872. Total assets January 1, 1861, $6,646,292.10; profits for 1860, $1,594,000. Six per cent. interest on the outstanding certificates of profit will be paid to the holders thereof on and after the 5th of February, 1861.

After reserving two and one-half millions of dollars profits, the outstanding certificates of 1859 will be paid to the holders thereof. A dividend of 35 per cent. cash is declared on the net earned premiums for the year ending December 31, 1860.

For the year 1862, 40 per cent., free from Government tax, is declared.

Again, from reports of 1864:

Total amount of assets January 1, 1864, $9,265,546.32; net earnings remaining with the company, $5,268,370; profits for 1863, $2,630,800; after reserving three and one-half million dollars of profit, certificates of the issue of the year 1862 will be paid. A dividend of 40 per cent. is declared.

I call attention to the following table to illustrate the profits of these insurance companies during the war, when they were receiving war premiums:

Now, this Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company is the mutual insurance company which to-day is making this fight in Congress, with the $6,000,000 in its coffers, held there for whom, to be paid out to whom and on whose votes nobody knows. But under the laws of New York it will not be paid out on the vote of policy-holders any way.

Now, let me look at these insurance companies a little further. There were forty-five engaged in this business; the total number of claimant companies is forty-five. The number that have failed and wound up business, after the war-premium business was over and from losses subsequent to the war, is twenty-two.

Some of them have lost their books; some of their books have been burned, some have been sold for old paper. Twenty-two of the companies have failed and gone out of business, and are to-day, through this agent, asking Congress to provide by law that they shall recover for the losses caused by the English cruisers. If they get it where will it go? Take a company that has lost its books: what are they going to do with it? How are they going to account for it?

Take the Boylston Company, in Massachusetts, which had a claim of $150,000 inclusive of interest against this fund. It sold that claim at public auction in the streets of Boston, and an agent of the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company of New York bid it in for $1,000. Who paid the premiums to the Boylston Company? The ship-owners and the cargo-owners. What have they done with the premiums? Divided them out to stockholders. What has become of the company? After the war, and from losses incurred after the war, the company has failed.

Now, if you pay this $150,000 and interest to them, who will get it? The Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company, of New York, with its securities of six and a half millions. Is there any obligation on them to pay it out to these war-premium men? None on earth. Do you think they will do it?

Again, if these companies recover say $6,000,000 from this fund, where will it go? Must not they pay their creditors before they divide it among the premium-holders? Well, gentlemen, the total amount of unpaid liabilities of only twelve of these bankrupt companies is $13,500,000. Suppose you pay the money to them, where will it go? It will go to the creditors of the companies, those who have become their creditors since the war, if it goes out of the hands of the officers of the companies, provided you can find officers of the companies into whose hands you can pay it.

The total amount of war claims of twenty-two bankrupt or closed companies is $1,698,000. Suppose they recover the amount. Recollect that you must add to it two-thirds of the amount for interest. Suppose they recover it, will a war-premium man get a cent? Can he get a cent? Must they not, under their charter, pay their creditors since the war instead of paying it out in dividends to war-premium men? Then what becomes of this talk about mutual insurance companies taking this money and paying it out to the men who paid it in during the war? They know it is an utter impossibility for them to do it.

Then, again, we say, in behalf of the war-premium men, that we do not want any bankrupt concern to take our money and do with it as they please. Again, we say that we do not want any receiver of the Columbian Mutual Insurance Company of New York to compel us to bring a suit at law in order to force them to disgorge this money which you put into their hands.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois.) One minute.

Mr. KNOTT. I ask that the time of my colleague on the committee be extended if he so desires.

Mr. FRYE. I would like to have my time extended. I do not know exactly how long I shall require.

Mr. KNOTT. I hope there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unless there be objection the time of the gentleman will be extended. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to say right here that the New Bedford insurance companies which have not failed were strictly mutual insurance companies; yet they do not claim that they ought to be paid this money. They say "Pay it to the war-premium men who paid it into our hands. We have no desire to receive it." These companies are not here as claimants.

Again, sir, I say that in the law passed by the Forty-third Congress we provided that these insurance companies should recover all net losses on the war-premium business on the insurance of ships and cargoes against loss during the war from the casualities of war. Taking advantage of that law, they have been before the tribunal we created and have every one of them recovered every dollar of their loss. They have that money to-day. They recovered it for losses caused by exculpated cruisers, and also for the losses of war premium paid to other insurance companies to take the risks off their hands: so that to-day there is not an insurance company in America that can show one single dollar of actual loss from the insurance of vessels or cargoes during the late war.

Now, whatever gentlemen on this floor may do, however much we may be influenced by the cry which is made here for insurance companies, I submit to you, gentlemen, that you may put this case squarely to your constituents, and you cannot find one in one hundred who would vote to pay these insurance companies one single dollar. Why?

First, because they lost nothing; second, because they made money as they never made it before. Take the years 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865. The Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company, during these years, paid as cash to its stockholders 6 per cent. annually; as dividends 30 per cent., 40 per cent., 40 per cent., 40 per cent., 35 per cent. The Sun Mutual Insurance Company, for the same year, paid to its stockholders annually 6 per cent., and then as premiums 7½ per cent., 10 per cent., 16 per cent., 30 per cent., 12 per cent. The Mercantile Mutual paid annually to its stockholders 6 per cent., and as premiums 12 per cent., 17 per cent., 12 per cent., and 20 per cent.; the Commercial Union, for the same years, 10 per cent., 25 per cent., 20 per cent., 33⅓ per cent., 35 per cent., 25 per cent. So I might go on with company after company. They lost nothing. If they did lose they recovered every dollar of that loss in the court we created. Their dividends averaged through the whole war 25 per cent. Only half of the forty-five companies claimed to be mutual companies at all; the other half were well-recognized stock companies.

To the bill of the minority I have offered an amendment proposing to exclude insurance companies from this court unless they can show net losses. It is an amendment which has been adopted in this House three times, and its opponents have never numbered more than 35. It is an amendment which will make it absolutely certain that these companies, if you send them to the court, cannot take $6,000,000 and divide it among themselves. I trust that this amendment will prevail and that the bill reported by the minority of the committee will be substituted for the majority bill as amended. Why? Because it provides payment for the men who actually suffered by reason of the English cruisers.

I know that the words "actual sufferers" are in this majority bill; and I know that at least one of the gentlemen reporting it believes it would exclude insurance companies unless they could show losses. But I greatly fear, as the companies accept it so readily, that it would not exclude them; because a loss of profits is an actual loss; a suffering on account of profits not gained is an actual suffering; and in this view they might recover. I prefer my amendment, which will make it absolutely certain that they can go no further than the law of the last Congress and the previous Congress permits them to go.

Sir, I do claim that the men who paid those war premiums are the men entitled as a matter of moral obligation——

Mr. BRIDGES. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. BRIDGES. Did all the insurance companies present their claims to the commission that was appointed under the act of 1874?

Mr. FRYE. I cannot say whether all of them who suffered loss or could show loss did or did not. I suppose they did. There were four companies from Massachusetts that presented their claims and recovered for their losses.

Mr. BRIDGES. Under the law of 1874?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir. Under that law all companies could present their claims if they so pleased; and as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] suggests, if any did not present their claims, it was their own fault and their own neglect.

Now, sir, as to these war-premium men. When the war broke out we had twenty-seven hundred thousand tons of shipping on the ocean. In two years more of peace we would have outstripped England, and would have become the mistress of the seas. She saw it. She acknowledged belligerent rights in the month of May to the confederates, and at once the Sumter sailed. She destroyed the Golden Rocket, a ship from Bangor, Maine. The owners of the Golden Rocket sued the insurance company to recover. The court held it could not recover against a loss caused by a privateer, and our ship-owners and our owners of cargoes of priceless value on every sea in the whole wide world, in every bay, in every river, in every port, saw those ships and those cargoes at the mercy of these privateers.

Now, what could they do? Where was their safety? These insurance companies held the only key on earth to the door of safety, and they held it in iron hands with iron hearts, too, behind the iron hands. They said, "We will insure you against loss." We said, "We must be insured, because all that we have in the wide world is at the mercy of these privateers. What is your rate?" They fixed the rate from 5 per cent. to 30 per cent. I saw here a moment ago a telegram asking for insurance. On one ship it was put at 19½ per cent. and on the other at 30 per cent.; $100,000 insured, $30,000 premium!

Mr. LUTTRELL. Here is the telegram and I ask my friend to read it.

Mr. FRYE. Read it yourself, please.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I thank the gentleman. I will read the telegram:

NEW YORK, June 24, 1863.

THOMAS DAY, San Francisco:

Insured the Tell, Donata, and Crockett at 19½ per cent. and the America at 30 per cent.

MITCHELL, VANCE & CO.

That is what the insurance companies, friends of the gentleman from New York, charged the merchants of San Francisco.

Mr. FRYE. What company was it?

Mr. LUTTRELL. The telegram is from Mitchell, Vance & Co.

Mr. FRYE. They fixed their rates from 5 to 35 per cent. I say the average rate from New York to Canton was 15 per cent.; and I ask you, sir, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] who knows, how in the name of Heaven a ship-owner could run his ship under the American flag and pay 15 per cent. on a cargo of silk and tea? We were compelled to pay whatever they asked. They fixed the rates at a price they knew would be absolutely safe and they made more than $6,000,000 by the operation.

We paid them. Now what we want is to get it back. The reply of these gentlemen is this: "Oh, yes, you paid them; that is true; but you charged it back on the goods which were imported, and thus compelled the people to pay it, so that if anybody is to receive this Geneva award it should be the people to whom you charged over your war risks." Why, sir, if gentlemen will look at it only for a moment, that is absurd. Three-fourths of all the cargoes upon the ocean during the war were carried under the English flag, where no war premiums were paid either on ships or on cargoes. Who set the markets then, the one-fourth or the three-fourths? For instance, here is my ship, the Pawnee, lying at Liverpool, waiting for freights under the American flag. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] has a ship, the Resolute, lying at the same wharf, sailing under the English flag, also waiting for freights. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] is seeking the carriage of freights. He comes to our ships and says to the gentleman from Illinois, "What is your rate?" and to me, "What is yours? can you take my freights? There will be risks about it." "I have insured my ship, sir, against all risks and paid 8 per cent. I will insure your cargo against risks, too, and present you with the policy of insurance for which I paid 8 per cent." But, says the gentleman from Mississippi, "You do not make your ship equal to the ship of the gentleman from Chicago even then." "Why not?" "Because there is the risk of capture of your ship; there is the risk of detention of your ship; there is the risk, if it is destroyed, of the insurance company failing, on which you give me the policy of insurance, and to make it equal you must take my freight for less." Is not that so? And in order to get that freight from the gentleman from Mississippi I have to pay the war rate on my ship and pay the war rate on the cargo and give it to him, and then I have to carry it for less. Our ships come over to New York, and we pass our goods over to the commission merchant or the importing houses. Can I charge my war premium paid on the ship and on the cargo when my goods must compete with those which the gentleman from Illinois lands? Can I make the market price?

I say there was little or no profit to our ship-owners in the war. I say there was but little business open to us. A. A. Lowe & Co., of New York, had five ships in the China trade. They were patriotic men. They sailed them under the flag of America all through the war and lost every timber of their ships. I do not mean literally the ships themselves, but their value. They cannot get anything out of this fund because the insurance companies want it. I remember A. A. Lowe & Co. had a ship in Canton, the ship Success; and Captain McGillvray, of Maine, the owner of a ship called the Resolute was in Canton at the same time. They were both seeking freights. The freights were to be tea and silk. The Success under the American flag got twelve hundred tons of tea and two hundred tons of silk; it received $10 in currency freight and paid a war premium on the cargo, and when the ship landed in New York it had not enough out of the freight to pay the cook. Now, how as to the Resolute? The Resolute got $16 in gold for the same freight. Why $16 in gold? Because of the risk under the American flag Captain McGillvray transferred his ship to the English flag, nominally; $500 was all it cost him to do it. He ran it under the English flag all through the war, that being the whole cost. He arrived in New York at a time when gold was at 275, and he told me himself he netted $64,000 on the one trip. What did it cost to carry an American flag on the ocean to A. A. Lowe & Co., in New York?

The round voyage between New York and Shanghai is about a year. The ships could take perhaps a few hundred tons of coal out; they could not take back silk and tea, because the war premium on the ship and on the cargo would more than eat up every dollar of freight they could possibly get. American ships under the American flag rotted at the wharves of China because they had not money enough to get home.

How was it with Japan? The Japan trade was about the same as that of China. In neither could an American vessel pay expenses. It was impossible for many of them to return. More than one-half of the sales to the English were merely fictitious, nominal transfers, costing our American captains $500. The employment of our ships under our flag was limited to the coarsest and heaviest freights. They could do some business with Calcutta in hides, in jute, in rice, and in sugar. More of them were employed in the guano trade than in any other. Why? Because the Peruvian government owned the Guano Islands. All that a cargo cost them was to pay the black hands that shoveled it into the hold; and they never inquired about insurance on such a cargo. Nearly all of our large ships were engaged in this trade.

Now I wish to show you another thing. I am trying to show you that we were losing money and that we were patriotic, and not entitled to the sneer of the gentleman from New York. I have the trade reports of New York for 1873, from which I quote the following:

Trade reports of New York for 1873.

Freights—1873.	American.	Foreign.
Jan. 3.—To Liverpool, flour, per barrel	1*s.* 3*d.*	2*s.*
To Melbourne, per foot	30 to 32*c.*	40*c.*
Jan. 7.—To Liverpool, flour	1*s.* 9*d.* to 1*s.* 10½*d.*	2*s.* 9*d.*
To Glasgow, wheat, per bushel	7¾*d.*	8¼ to 9½*d.*
Engagement of lard and all high-priced goods were exclusively in foreign vessels.
Jan. 10.—To Liverpool, flour	1*s.* 10½*d.* to 2*s.*	2*s.* 10½*d.*
To Melbourne, per foot	27½ to 30*c.*	40*c.*
Jan. 14.—To Liverpool, beef, per tierce	4*s.*	6*s.* 6*d.*
bacon, per ton	20*s.*	30*s.* to 32*s.* 6*d.*
Feb. 14.—To Liverpool, flour	1*s.* 10*d.* to 2*s.*	2*s.* 6*d.* to 3*s.*
May 20.—Freights to Great Britain very active. The chartered cargoes have all been in foreign bottoms.
June 24.—There was a good business done yesterday, but at considerably lower rates, by American bottoms, foreign vessels still having the preference.
To Liverpool, flour	1*s.* 9*d.*	2*s.* 6*d.*
July 1.—There continues an active business in shipment of grain to British and continental ports by foreign bottoms at gradually appreciating prices. American bottoms are entirely neglected.
July 22.—Foreign tonnage still abundant; American neglected.
July 29.—To Liverpool, flour	1*s.* 3*d.*	2*s.*
Aug. 29.—To Liverpool, wheat	6*d.*	7*d.*
Sept. 12.—Freights dull; large foreign tonnage; American bottoms neglected.
Oct. 14.—American bottoms neglected.
Nov. 4.—Offerings are light, and neutral vessels continue to get the lion's share. Of some 150 vessels now loading for foreign ports only 20 are covered by the American flag.

I have taken this from the trade-lists of New York, showing that there was a discrimination of from 10 to 50 per cent. against American bottoms in all the trade from New York to foreign ports, simply because the American bottoms sailed under the American flag and were liable to be captured.

And yet gentlemen say that we made money and paid war premiums because we made money. Under the American flag we made no money. We sailed our vessels because we remembered what England had done, and we were determined, if it cost us every dollar we had in the world, we would sail those vessels under the old stars and stripes and pay the price of our patriotic pride. Yet to-day when we ask for our rights we are taunted with making money and the virtue of patriotism is given to the insurance companies.

Now, sir, there is another class provided for in the bill of the minority: those who lost by the exculpated cruisers.

What are they? Let me illustrate: I will take the Shenandoah as an illustration. The Shenandoah was built in England, equipped in England, armed in England, officered in England, sailed by English sailors, and everybody in England knew on what errand she was going when she sailed. She destroyed ship after ship until she got out of coal and provisions; and then she went into Melbourne to get her supplies. A few days before she went in she captured a ship of Mr. Metcalf, of Ohio, the Delphine, and destroyed it. That ship was uninsured against that destruction. The Shenandoah then destroyed all that Mr. Metcalf had in this world. She sailed into Melbourne carrying in there as prisoners the officers and crew of the Delphine.

The Shenandoah coaled and provisioned at Melbourne. Our consul gave notice to the English consul, demanding that she should not be permitted to coal and provision in a neutral port. In spite of that notice she coaled and provisioned there, and again went to sea and again commenced destroying vessels.

Now under what they claim is the Geneva award the gentlemen hold that the ships destroyed after Melbourne must be paid for; but the ships destroyed before Melbourne, the one belonging to Mr. Metcalf, shall not be paid for. Why not? The Shenandoah was the same ship, with the same officers, with the same men, and on the same voyage; she had the same English character all through the voyage. Why, then, exculpate her before Melbourne and inculpate her after? I will undertake to show.

We had always been contending for the rights of neutrals, because we were neutrals while these countries were constantly in war. Many of us were anxious to run privateers on our own account. And our Government knew that we could put three hundred privateers on the ocean in thirty days and she would have no knowledge of it whatever. Suppose that a war had taken place between Russia and England. Within thirty days there would have been one hundred privateers on the ocean, preying on English commerce and paying back the price which she compelled us to pay by the sacrifice of our commerce; and our Government would have had no notice of it whatever.

Our Government contended for a rule which should secure the rights of neutrals. England having a claim made against her for all these cruisers was willing to listen to the determination then. The boot then was on the other foot. So she quietly agreed that actual notice to a government should be required to hold a neutral liable for privateers. Hence, the Shenandoah before Melbourne and before notice is exculpated; the Shenandoah after Melbourne and after notice is inculpated.

Now, to our country that rule in a war would be worth more than the whole of the Geneva award. Yet in order to acquire it our Government gave up and yielded all the losses by all our citizens which were caused by the exculpated cruisers. The inculpated cruisers were only three, and one of them for only a part of the time. The exculpated cruisers could be counted by the score; but they were all given up and these three only included in order that our Government in all the future might point England to a rule to which she had consented, and thus relieve herself from damages.

Now is there any moral obligation on the part of the United States to see to it that we who suffered loss by exculpated cruisers shall be paid, when the Government itself in that single rule has got more than enough to pay it over and over again in the future which lies before us?

When Mr. Metcalf heard that his ship was destroyed he started at once for New York. He heard that the Shenandoah had been seized, carried into England, and delivered to our minister. He determined to go to Europe; just before he started he learned that the Shenandoah had been sold and the proceeds covered into the Treasury of the United States. Yet, forsooth, Mr. Metcalf cannot recover one single dollar of this fifteen and a half millions, while the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company, with its six millions of laid-up capital it is claimed on this floor shall be permitted to recover three millions more. In the name of justice will the House of Representatives of the Forty-fifth Congress allow or consent to any such monstrosity as that?

Mr. Speaker, I ask the pardon of this House for trespassing upon its patience so long as I have, and for arguing this case in this desultory and disconnected manner. I have, I admit, much feeling in the case. There are thousands of men in my own State who were made utterly poor, houseless, and homeless because they sailed their ships under the American flag in a time of war and paid the penalty because the Government was powerless to protect them. In one little city in my district the war premiums alone which were paid amount to more than the valuation of all the personal property in that city. One single constituent of mine had twenty laden ships upon the ocean when the Sumter destroyed the Golden Rocket. The penalty which these men have paid for their patriotism is poverty, poverty caused in part by the very sums they paid these insurance companies who claim at your hands to-day the reward of reducing these men to poverty.

The war, thank God, is over. The feelings generated by it are fast disappearing. So rapidly have they disappeared that I dare stand here and appeal to the gentlemen who fought on the other side, to those gentlemen who were aided by Great Britain when she sent out these privateers upon the ocean to prey upon our commerce. I dare appeal to them in the name of the flag of to-day, in the name of the country which is theirs and ours, to see to it that justice and mercy shall prevail on this great question.

Mr. STENGER. Mr. Speaker, as one of the members of the Judiciary Committee joining in the majority report upon the pending bill, I desire as briefly as I can to give my reasons for my action in that regard. I would not underrate but would rather magnify the importance of this subject. It is not only important, but I confess that it is to me one that has a peculiar fascination. The story of the operations of the confederate cruisers upon the high seas during the war of the rebellion is one of the most thrilling interest. The consequences which resulted from those operations—direct in the first instance, in the loss of vessels and cargoes, indirect in the second instance, in the transfer of a large part of the American commercial marine to the British flag, the prolongation of the war, and the enhancement of the rates of insurance—were all of the most serious moment to our Government. I have examined with very great interest everything in the negotiations between the United States and Great Britain which led to the making of the treaty of Washington under which the tribunal at Geneva was established. I have examined, too, with care, the proceedings had before that tribunal down to the rendering of the award which gave to our Government the sum of $15,500,000. All this has possessed a strange interest to me. I have admired, also, the ingenuity, skill, and force with which the arguments on either side have been presented by the gentlemen who have taken part in this discussion, evincing profound study and much learning, and characterized as they have been by a great variety and beauty of illustration. But it seems to me that my vote upon this bill is not to be governed by the arguments on either side. It is just because this bill does not decide between these rival claimants that I have given it my support.

I might (and it would be a pleasure to me) comment upon the cases of the two governments as they were presented to that tribunal, and the award itself, but under my view of our duty in the premises I would thus exhaust the patience of the House to no purpose.

I do not conceive that a discussion of those matters is necessary to the decision of the question presented by the bill which comes from the majority of the Judiciary Committee. I want to call back the House if I can to the consideration of the bill which is pending before it. I desire to speak to it strictly.

What matters it whether I adopt the view of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] who opened this discussion the other day, that "the award at Geneva was a judgment in favor of the insurance companies," or that I adopt the opinion of my distinguished colleague upon the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. LAPHAM,] that "it is little less than mockery to treat it as such?" What matters it whether I adopt the opinion of the distinguished gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] that the doctrine of subrogation does not apply, or whether I adopt the doctrine of my distinguished friend from New York who sits on my left, [Mr. POTTER,] who says that the doctrine of subrogation does apply?

Under the bill which lies upon your table I need not decide that question. I propose not to decide it. I say that for the proper discussion of this case as it comes before us upon the pending bill it is not necessary that I should give an opinion one way or the other as to how this money should be distributed. It is no business of mine whether it goes to the war-premium claimants or to the insurance companies. It is no business of mine whether it goes to the people who suffered losses on account of inculpated cruisers or to the people who suffered losses on account of exculpated cruisers. That question does not arise at all in connection with the pending bill. The question is not whether I shall enter into the feelings of the distinguished gentleman from Maine who last addressed the House, who represents a district I believe which will receive of this fund $1,000,000 or more if the bill which he supports be adopted, or whether I shall enter into the feelings of those gentlemen who represent the insurance companies, and who would like to have a bill passed directing payment to them? I do not desire to partake of the zeal of either class of claimants.

I do not want to decide the question as to which of them shall come in upon the fund; and it is just for the very reason that this conflict of opinion has arisen, it is just for the very reason that there is a clash of such minds as those of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] on the one side and the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] on the other, that I halt and hesitate, and say that I ought not to decide that question and that it ought to be lifted above passion and prejudice, above the local interests of any and every section, and taken to a court which will "keep the scale of justice even and steady and not liable to waver with every new judge's opinion" or the opinion of every new set of judges.

I stand here to-day perfectly disinterested upon this question. I represent a constituency that, as far as I know, has not one dollar's worth of interest in this bill. I have no man at my back crying to me that I shall go for a bill here that will pay his losses. I have no insurance company standing at my back and saying that I shall go for a bill that will pay its losses. Therefore it is that I, speaking in explanation of my own action in signing this report and of the vote which I shall cast for the bill reported by the majority, feel that my judgment has not been influenced by any outside considerations or pressure, that the conclusion which I have reached is right, and that the distribution of this fund should be made by the courts according to the principles of "justice, equity, and the law of nations," as this bill provides. In view of this, Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at the first sentence which I find in the views of the minority upon this bill, which reads as follows:

> For the first time in the history of the legislation of either branch of Congress the insurance companies have succeeded in persuading a majority of the Judiciary Committee into the recommendation of the bill advocated by them for the distribution of the Geneva award fund.

This is the language of a report signed, among others, by two gentlemen from New England who represent nearly all the war-premium claimants upon this fund. I would not intimate that they have any personal interest in this bill—far from it; I do not believe they have. But I know how local interests of that kind must sway men's judgments so that they cannot act with that impartiality with which they would act under other circumstances; and it seems strange to me that gentlemen so situated, backed by claimants upon this fund who expect to take out of it such a large amount of money, should charge upon gentlemen of the majority that they have been "prevailed upon" by insurance companies to report this bill.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is not what the insurance companies wanted. It is not what the war-premium men wanted. Ever since the agitation of the distribution of this fund these people have come into and about the halls of Congress, and they have asked that a distribution of this fund should be made by Congress which shall pay either the one or the other. There has been one continuous, desperate struggle between these two sets of claimants. The insurance companies would be glad if they could get a bill passed through this House ordering payment of this fund, just as the war-premium claimants would wish to have distribution made to them by our legislation. And, sir, I say that so far as the substitute reported by the minority goes, it proposes that we as Representatives in Congress shall say that a certain class or certain classes of people shall be paid and other classes excluded, while the bill of the majority proposes that there shall be no discrimination between the parties when they come into court, but that they shall stand upon an equal footing.

Thus situated between these rival claimants, the majority of the Judiciary Committee came to what conclusion? Why, that they would send all these claimants to a court. That was thought better than a commission. It was thought better than a board of commissioners such as that which is proposed to be revived and re-established by the bill offered as a substitute by the minority. It was thought better than that for reasons which I shall send to the Clerk's desk to be read, given far more ably than I can give them, against the establishment of such a commission, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] whose name is signed to the minority report recommending just such a bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

> The only antagonism of which your committee is aware to having the distribution of this fund settled by a suit in a single court, with the proper claimants made parties, comes from those who desire that a commission should be established, to sit in Washington, to adjudicate this matter. To this proposition your committee have most decided objections. Here are over $15,000,000 to be divided among certain claimants, who are urging their claims with all the zeal that private interests and large sums at stake can command, and it is well known that all Government claims of this description are generally taken in hand by a class of men known as claim agents, some of whom are admitted to the bar and some not, under no responsibility whatever to the commission, itself temporary, which can have no control over them or the propriety of their action, and if they wrong either the clients or the Government can administer no rebuke or punishment to them who carry on this business of advocating claims upon the Government generally upon contingent fees and large percentages, the average of which is not lower, so far as your committee can learn, than 25 per cent.; and as the possibility of obtaining any reward for their services depends upon success, a quarter of this fund—with the accrued interest nearly five millions—the amount of these fees which may or may not be realized, according as the commission can or cannot be moved in favor of the claimants, stands as a fund ready to be used by corrupt men to carry their purposes.
> Your committee do not believe it is wise to expose officers quasi-judicial to such great temptation, and to put it in the power of interested parties to obtain claims against the Government through such great inducements as might be used under these circumstances. The prayer "lead us not into temptation" has been ordained as necessary for the daily use and guidance of all Christian men for more than eighteen hundred years.
> Besides, the adjudications of this commission are necessarily final, as it is no part of the judicial system of the United States, so that your committee do not see how any appeal can be taken to the Supreme Court. Further, if this commission once gets itself established there is great danger, by referring claims to it on other subject-matters, that it may be continued indefinitely, to say nothing of the very considerable expenses which would attend it, amounting to some fifty to one hundred thousand dollars, even if the Government could get five men fit to do this work, together with the other expenses, for that sum. Nor does your committee think it wise thus to add to the number of office-holders under the Government if its work can be done by the ordinary judicial machinery, which no one doubts. The record of commissions in matters of claims as against governments has not always been so bright and clear as to make it certain that the interest of the Government will be safe as against individual greed, while the United States can say with pride that the integrity of her highest judicial officers has never been questioned, and that of the lower very rarely, and as yet never proven.
> On the contrary, if these claims are brought before a court they must be advocated by members of its bar, who will be held responsible to the court for their action, and every adjudication must be made in open day, publishing to the world the grounds and reasons of it and subject to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, as in other cases.

Mr. STENGER. Mr. Speaker, I need not add a word to strengthen the positions assumed in that extract from the report of the gentleman to whom I have referred.

But the Judiciary Committee thought further that it was better that this distribution should not be made by the legislature. I confess I have a very high respect for the intelligence of the gentlemen who compose this body. I think I know the intellectual worth of many of them; and, sir, as I would not trust myself upon this question, if there were any local interests of my constituents involved, so I would not trust any other gentleman upon the floor. I would be afraid that his judgment would be biased in favor of his constituents: I would be afraid his judgment would be prejudiced against certain people whom he did not like. I know that there is a widespread feeling against corporations. For instance, I know men who are such bitter enemies of corporations that they would vote against any measure if they knew it would redound to the benefit of a corporation, and for that reason only. I am not one of those, sir. I am neither for nor against them. I would mete out to them simple, even-handed justice as I would mete it out to any individual, and believing that the best place to have justice meted out to corporations as well as to individuals is in a court I would remove the decision of that question from the legislative halls. I would not have men vote as to the distribution of this fund who are animated by any bias or prejudice or passion or local interest at all. I would remove it from such an arena into a court where men sit above all such passions and prejudices, men who are trained in the law, men who have the time to give to the consideration of questions of this kind; because you, sir, know as well as I, and every member of this House knows, that amid the multitudinous affairs which press upon us for action and decision we have not the time to give in order to make a proper decision of such an important question as this.

But, sir, I have another reason why I do not believe any such question should be decided by a legislative body. This body is of but two years duration. Every two years the members of the House of Representatives change. At the other end of the Capitol one-third of its members go out every two years. It is changing constantly. Here is a great question in which the right of property is involved. It is a question in which the right to a great amount of money is involved, and I appeal to every lawyer who sits before me whether it is not far better when rights of property are to be adjudicated they shall not be passed upon by bodies which shift and change like these, but by courts? What better tribunal can there be to pass upon this question than a court? Why should not this go into "a place where justice is judicially administered?" Why should it not go where the case can be decided without fear, favor, or affection? Why shall it not go to a tribunal which is constituted for the very purpose of passing upon disputed questions of law and fact? Why shall it not go to a court which will have no local interests pressing upon it, which will have no passions aroused, which will have no prejudices excited, but which can sit calmly and dispassionately and adjudicate these questions in the manner in which this bill proposes they shall be adjudicated?

In order to guard this perfectly, Mr. Speaker, so the rights of all these people shall be protected, we do not propose, as do the minority of this committee, that the action of the first court to which it goes shall be final. We do not propose, as they propose, that three judges, to be appointed by the President of the United States, shall pass upon all these questions and that their decision shall be final. Not at all. But we propose that the suit shall be brought in the Court of Claims, to be decided there in the first instance with the right of appeal to the aggrieved party, whether it be the United States Government or the claimant, to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Ought anything more be asked, can anything fairer be granted, than that the highest judicial tribunal of this land shall pass upon the question of the rights of all these claimants to a portion or the whole of this fund? If there are errors committed by the Court of Claims in any of the cases that are brought before them, they can be corrected by the higher court, and then there can be no just complaint about it. Do I speak beyond the card when I say this? Let me examine the bill itself and draw your attention to its provisions.

Who are sent to this court by this bill? I have heard a charge coming up from the other side of the chamber, and I have been accustomed to it in reading the debates and discussions which have gone on for years before Congress, that a bill of this kind committing this matter to the courts would be framed in the interests of the insurance companies; and parties have sought to excite prejudice on that account against the bill now pending before this body. Let me read its language:

All persons and corporations claiming to be entitled to any portions of the moneys now under control of the United States which were received from the Government of Great Britain in payment of the Geneva award, or as interest thereon, be, and they are hereby, authorized to sue for the same in the United States Court of Claims.

Is there any limitation there? Is there any exclusion of anybody? Can the insurance company say it is shut out? Can the war-premium claimant say he is shut out? Can the loser by an exculpated cruiser say he is shut out? Can the loser by an inculpated cruiser say he is shut out? No. The language is as broad as it can be made:

All persons and corporations claiming.

But I am told and the House is told in the minority report that delay will be occasioned if it goes there. Why? When must these parties sue? I quote the language of the bill:

At any time within one year from the passage of this act, in the same manner in which other claims are sued in said court.

But in order that there shall not be delay the bill provides further that when the claimant or the United States Government feels that he or it has been aggrieved by the decision of the Court of Claims and takes out an appeal to the Supreme Court, that appeal shall take precedence of all other cases in the Supreme Court. This provision is intended to hasten administration of justice to these claimants and to facilitate the payment of any judgment that may be rendered in their favor in the court. It goes farther, and provides for the time of payment, as you will see by looking at the bill, making it, if I mistake not, within ten days after the judgment has been perfected, either in the Court of Claims, when no appeal is taken, or in the Supreme Court after appeal and decision thereon.

Now who shall obtain judgment under this bill? "Each claimant who was an actual sufferer by the violation of the laws of neutrality by Great Britain." That is the language. Not that the insurance companies shall get a judgment and nobody else, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] insists; not that the war-premium claimants only shall get a judgment, as the gentleman from Maine insists they only should; not that a loser by an inculpated cruiser shall get a judgment, or a loser by an exculpated cruiser, but "each claimant who was an actual sufferer by the violation of the laws of neutrality by Great Britain." Could we have made it broader? Could we have acted more fairly when we decided to send this matter to the courts? Nobody is excluded. Now for what shall they get a judgment?

For such amount only as, in their opinion—

That is, in the opinion of the court—

he shall be justly entitled to recover under said treaty and award according to the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations.

Ought anybody to get a judgment unless he can get it under the treaty of Washington, under the award at Geneva, and "according to the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations." I say no; emphatically, no! I care not who the claimant upon that fund may be. If he cannot bring himself within the language of that sentence he is not entitled, he ought not to be entitled, to receive a judgment in his favor from any court, from any commission, or from any legislative body. Mark you, when we ask that this shall be done we do it in accordance with precedents. We do not ask you to do a novel thing when we ask you to pass this bill, because, as the report of the majority shows, upon the distribution of the fund arising from the treaties made between the United States and Great Britain in 1826, between the United States and Denmark in 1830, between the United States and France in 1831, between the United States and the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies in 1832, between the United States and Spain in 1834, between the United States and Peru in 1841, between the United States and Brazil in 1849, and between the United States and China in 1858, the provision was that the distribution should be made "according to justice, equity, and the law of nations"—the very language which is used in the majority report accompanying the pending bill.

And I need not say to the lawyers of this House that Blackstone tells us "it is an established rule to abide by former precedents where the same points come again in litigation." And where questions of this character come again, as they do here, to be decided as they have been decided in the cases which I have enumerated heretofore, it ought to be the same as where points of litigation arise before the courts; they ought to be binding upon us as the rule of conduct by which we should be guided. But, mark you, it is not only according to "law." The distinguished gentleman from Maine would have you believe that under the technical rules which obtain in a court of law the war-premium claimants might be shut out and that the sufferers by the exculpated cruisers might be shut out. He has no warrant for that, because the majority have gone further and they have not only asked that this distribution shall be made "according to law," which I admit is not always "the perfection of reason," but they ask that it shall be distributed according to equity whose courts are established, according to Blackstone, "to detect latent frauds and concealments which the process of the courts of law is not adapted to reach; to enforce the execution of such matters of trust and confidence as are binding in conscience, though not cognizable in a court of law; to deliver from such dangers as are owing to misfortune or oversight; and to give a more specific relief, and more adapted to the circumstances of the case, than can always be obtained by the generality of the rules of the positive or common law."

They ask that it shall be distributed according to equity, which Grotius defines to be "the correction of that wherein the law (by reason of its universality) is deficient."

Under the bill of the majority, the various claims that may be presented are to be decided according to the law of nations, according to justice, according to equity. Can anybody ask more than that? Yet over and over again we have heard the cry that the majority of the committee favor the insurance companies. Time and again we have had it repeated on this floor that insurance companies have "prevailed upon" a majority of the committee to report this bill. I stand here to-day, Mr. Speaker, to defend this bill and this report, because I believe them to be right, and because I believe it would be anything else than right to say that any set of claimants upon this fund shall be excluded from the distribution, so that the court shall not be able to pass upon the question as to how the whole balance remaining in the Treasury shall be distributed. I would not put any trammels upon that court by saying that none of the fund shall go to the insurance companies; I would not put any restrictions upon that court by saying that no part of the fund shall go to the war-premium claimants or to the losers by the exculpated cruisers, although (as it has been often urged upon this floor) the very tribunal sitting at Geneva excluded them from its consideration in making up the award. No, I would let every man and every insurance company that claims any portion of this fund go before that court untrammeled in every particular; and it is for this reason I support the bill reported by the majority. Hence my opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine, which proposes to dictate to and control the court in the matter of the claims of insurance companies. I say here (and I believe it will strike every candid man as being right) that if the insurance companies before a tribunal clothed with all the powers of a court of law and equity can show themselves entitled to recover under the treaty and the award, they ought to recover. So if under the principles of law and equity as administered in that court any of the war-premium claimants or all of them, or any or all of the losers by exculpated cruisers, can show themselves entitled to recover, they ought to recover. But I ask you, looking upon this question calmly and dispassionately, whether you or I or any of us or all together ought to decide this question? Is it not far better, is it not far safer, to let it go to a court of law and equity?

I stand here to-day also to repudiate the idea that this fund ought to lie in the Treasury. I do not believe in any such doctrine. I do not believe that after we proved claims for direct losses to the amount of the award; after we pressed our claims upon the attention of Great Britain for a far larger sum than was allowed us; after we insisted that she ought to pay the indirect losses; after we made such claims as those upon Great Britain, and this award of fifteen and one-half millions of dollars was paid into the Treasury, I do not believe we ought now to say to Great Britain and to the world that we cannot tell to whom Great Britain owed this money, that we are not able to find out to whom this fund belongs, and because we cannot find that out we mean to cover it into the Treasury and hold it there tightly in our grasp. I believe that the honor of the nation is at stake in this particular. I have a high appreciation of the ability of the men who framed the treaty of Washington. It was a grand triumph of American skill in diplomacy. It has secured to us the recognition of a principle as to the duty and liability of a neutral nation in time of war that is of the utmost value to this people. I have the highest appreciation of the tribunal which sat at Geneva, of the reputation of the gentlemen who composed it for intelligence and learning. I have the highest opinion of the counsel who stood before that tribunal on either side of the question.

I look upon that award, no matter whether the money comes to us as a nation or whether it comes to us in trust for claimants, as an award of money which this Government ought to pay to somebody. I believe we ought to find out who is entitled to it, and that the way to find this out is in a court of justice. I believe it is our duty as representatives of this people, whose honor is at stake, to see to it that the national honor shall not be tarnished, either by keeping this money in the Treasury, or by authorizing its payment hurriedly, without proper examination, without time for examination, to people to whom it ought not to go. In this view of the case, I protest against the amendment of the gentleman from Maine; I protest against the bill presented by the minority here; and I ask the gentlemen of this House to take into serious consideration the question whether the bill which I have sketched—feebly, I know, but sketched as well as my ability will permit—does not present the best plan for disposing of this perplexing controversy, that plan being that the courts, untrammeled, shall pass upon all the points involved and determine them as to them shall seem proper and as to justice and equity doth appertain.

Mr. BURCHARD. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. Who is recognized as entitled to the floor when this question comes up again?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. Then I yield for the motion to adjourn. I desire to inquire whether the whole of the hour of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STENGER] has been consumed.

The SPEAKER. It has not. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he designs to give away his remaining time—fifteen minutes.

Mr. STENGER. I yield that time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair, proceeding according to the list, will recognize the gentleman from Michigan as next entitled to the floor when the subject comes up again.

ELECTORAL VOTES.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 1308) to amend sundry provisions of chapter 1, title 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to presidential elections, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States and the decision of questions arising thereon, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws Regulating the Counting of the Electoral Votes for President and Vice-President, and ordered to be printed, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

SUBSISTENCE OF THE ARMY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to the appropriation for the subsistence of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ENLARGEMENT OF THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, relative to the enlargement of the Interior Department building; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

And then, on motion of Mr. BURCHARD, (at three o'clock and forty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 16, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

WILLIAM H. BARNUM, a Senator from the State of Connecticut, appeared in his seat to-day.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I ask permission of the Senate to say that on Friday last I was detained from my seat in consequence of severe and sudden illness. As my views in regard to the power of the two Houses of Congress in counting the electoral votes are well known, it seems hardly necessary to say anything in regard to my vote; yet I desire to make the statement that had I been present when the bill reported by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] was on its passage I should have voted against it.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Manufacturers' Association of the Northwest have sent me a certain preamble and resolutions, in the nature of a memorial, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They will be reported at length.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

THE MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION OF THE NORTHWEST,
Chicago, December 11, 1878.

SIR: I am instructed to transmit to you the following resolutions, which have been adopted by the Manufacturers' Association of the Northwest, with the request that they be presented and acted upon at the earliest possible moment:

Whereas the communication addressed to this association by Hon. J. W. Foster, United States minister to the Republic of Mexico, contains statements that are biased and prejudiced, and are at variance with the official reports of United States consuls at the several ports and stations of that republic, as published under the direction of the State Department of this Government, and in direct contradiction to the experience of well-known and responsible citizens of the United States who have resided in that country for many years; and

Whereas the commercial relations that our merchants and manufacturers are endeavoring to establish between the United States and Mexico require that the true condition of affairs in that country be fully known and thoroughly understood before investing money and time in such enterprises: Be it therefore

Resolved by the Manufacturers' Association of the Northwest, That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, respectfully memorialized to send a subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce of each House respectively to accompany an excursion party that purposes leaving this city for Mexico on the 4th day of January next, with instructions to investigate and report upon the practicability of establishing more direct and intimate commercial relations between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, and to make such suggestions as the knowledge thus acquired may, in their opinion, be conducive to that end.

Be it further resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to present the above resolutions and urge their adoption.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

DAVID H. MASON,
Secretary of the Manufacturers' Association of the Northwest.

Hon. DAVID DAVIS,
United States Senator, Illinois, Washington, D. C.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I am not disposed to urge the Senate to any action upon the resolutions at the present time. I move that they be referred to the Committee on Commerce for its action.

The motion was agreed to.

Bigelow & Co., Gill & Fisher, and others, merchants and shippers of Baltimore City, praying for the passage of a law making an appropriation for the construction and maintenance of a light-ship on the upper middle ground in Chesapeake Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Captain F. K. Grant, John McWhinnie, Edgar Jenkins, and others, masters of vessels sailing out of the port of Baltimore, praying for the passage of a law appropriating a sum of money to construct and maintain a light-ship on the upper middle ground in Chesapeake Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Alabama, in favor of the repeal of the law imposing a tax of 10 per cent. on the issues of State banks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. OGLESBY. I present a memorial on the same subject as that presented by my colleague a few moments ago, from the Manufacturers' Association of the Northwest, Chicago, Illinois, and I ask that it may take the same reference with the memorial presented by him.

I will also state that I should be glad if the Committee on Commerce would pay some attention to it before the adjournment for the holidays, as the commission to visit Mexico on this subject will take its departure from Chicago about the 4th of January. This memorial asks Congress to appoint a subcommittee of the Committees on Commerce of both Houses to accompany that delegation to visit the Republic of Mexico. I should be glad if the Committee on Commerce would give the subject some attention within a day or two. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Commerce.

No. 4234) providing for the payment of arrears of pensions; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. I also present a memorial which inasmuch as it is not technically addressed to Congress I am not sure is quite in order, and yet I venture to present it being among other things a resolution of the Elmira Academy of Medicine urging legislation which it is understood is proposed and now before the Printing Committee for printing an exhaustive catalogue of medical books, journals, pamphlets, and the like in the office or the Surgeon-General, which these memorialists deem very important. It goes I suppose to the Committee on Printing, and I move its reference to that committee.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Printing was to substitute for the original resolution the following:

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the copies of Walker's Statistical Atlas heretofore ordered for the use of the two Houses of Congress be bound by the Public Printer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

SILVER COIN FOR DUTIES.

Mr. BECK. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed and required to appear before the Senate in person on Wednesday next at one o'clock p. m., to inform the Senate what reason, if any, he has for failing to answer the resolution of the Senate passed on the 3d day of December, 1878, which is in the following words:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate what amount of silver coin has been received in payment of customs dues since the beginning of the current fiscal year, and whether or not he has applied the silver coin so received, in whole or in part, to the payment of the interest on the bonds or notes of the United States; if it has not been so applied, to state the reason why; if it has been applied to that purpose in part only, to state what portion has been so used and on what character of obligation. He is directed to inform the Senate the amount of interest he has paid on the bonds and notes of the United States since the current fiscal year began, and the amount of such interest which he has paid in gold and silver coin respectively."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to this resolution?

Mr. MORRILL. If the Senator from Kentucky desires to discuss this question this morning, to make any presentation of his views upon the subject, I have no objection to hearing him; but the time has been so short since the resolution was introduced, if the Senator will reflect for a moment upon the various sources from which this information must be derived, that it is hardly possible that the Secretary of the Treasury should have had time to obtain the information and put it in a form to present it. I have no sort of doubt but that the Secretary is quite willing to answer this as speedily as it is possible for him to present the facts, and I infer from some conversation I had with him that the answer will come in perhaps to-day.

Mr. BECK. My only object in introducing the resolution is to obtain an answer to the resolution of the Senate passed December 3.

Mr. BLAINE. One single moment. I hope an objection is not too late. I do not want to have this matter take possession of the day.

Mr. MORRILL. I rose merely to say——

Mr. BLAINE. I have no objection to hearing the Senator from Kentucky. Of course I do not mean that.

Mr. BECK. Of course upon an objection being made the resolution will lie over. I repeat, the only object I have is to obtain before the holidays an answer from the Secretary of the Treasury relative to matters which he was directed to report upon to the Senate. The time is very short. Perhaps the duties and labors of his office and the force at his command may be of such a character that he is unable to answer as fully as he would like to do, but I presume it would in no way embarrass the Secretary to appear before the Senate on Wednesday next and give his reasons for the delay. Perhaps he could do it better in that way than by making a written report. The Senator from Vermont remembers very well that the Revised Statutes provides for that, and it is understood that the first Secretary of the Treasury, perhaps for his own convenience, had this provision made. Section 248 in part reads as follows:

> The Secretary of the Treasury * * * shall make report, and give information to either branch of the legislature in person or in writing, as may be required, respecting all matters referred to him by the Senate or House of Representatives, or which shall appertain to his office; and generally shall perform all such services relative to the finances as he shall be directed to perform.

As I said there can be no embarrassment to the Secretary in appearing, under the provision of the law which was inserted at the request of Mr. Hamilton himself, before the Senate and giving us the reasons he has, if any, for failing to answer a Senate resolution. Among the reasons why I desire an answer before we take a recess is that the Secretary in his report announces the fact that—

> As yet paper money has been depreciated, and silver dollars being receivable for customs dues, have naturally not entered into general circulation, but have returned to the Treasury in payment of such dues, and thus the only effect of the attempt of the Department to circulate them has been to diminish the gold revenue.

That being the fact, the law of the United States provides, by a positive mandate about which there can be no misunderstanding, (see section 3694,) that—

> The coin paid for duties on imported goods shall be set apart as a special fund, and shall be applied as follows:
> First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.
> Second. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.
> Third. The residue to be paid into the Treasury.

As the Secretary announces to us that a very large amount of interest will fall due on the 1st day of January and that he has on hand a considerable amount—how much I do not know—of silver coin or certificates, which by the statute is coin, received from customs, which is specially dedicated and set apart by law, first, to the payment of interest on the public debt, and as he has in his annual report informed us of a great many things that he desires to do and will do on the 1st of January, unless specially ordered by Congress to do otherwise, I think it extremely important that we should have the information from the Secretary, first, as to the amount of silver coin he has thus received from customs dues; second, whether he has applied it, as the law requires him to apply it, to the payment of interest on the public debt, and if he has not, to tell us why not.

I intend if possible to have the law obeyed by all our officials, high and low. Senators will readily see the object I have in view. Whether the silver bill was a good one or not it is the law of the land, and I shall insist, as long as that law remains on the statute-book, that the Secretary of the Treasury and all other officers shall comply with it. We have high authority for the position that the only way to make a bad law odious and secure its repeal is to enforce the law itself. I think the silver bill was a good law. Senators may differ as to that; all must agree that it is the law. I can perceive no possibility of doubt as to the truth of the fact that the Secretary cannot, without being guilty of embezzlement under the embezzlement act, apply the silver coin received from customs to any other purpose than, first, to the payment of interest on the public debt, and I desire to see that he is required to so pay it. I am free to say that it is because of the action that was taken or threatened to be taken by a number of bankers in New York, who determined to discriminate against the silver dollar, and who sought, as far as they were able, to override the laws of Congress or force us to repeal or modify the silver bill for their benefit, that I want the silver dollar received for customs to be paid to them and their fellow-bondholders. They hold $360,000,000 of the bonds of the United States. They have been receiving their interest in gold all the time, and keeping up the premium to increase their profits, and now when the law says that they shall receive their interest in the silver dollar paid for duties at the custom-house, I intend, as far as in me lies, to see to it that they are required to take them, and they will see to it that the silver dollar which they are required to take for their interest is made good and maintained. They will become bulls in the silver market instead of bears. The Secretary of the Treasury is our agent, not theirs, and he should be ordered in no uncertain way to comply with the law as it stands so long as it remains upon the statute-book.

I am not seeking by my resolution for his personal appearance to reflect upon the Secretary, nor do I seek to embarrass him; but the Senate ought to know the facts for the reasons I have given, and because the Secretary in the report from which I have read has assumed that after the 1st day of January he will receive legal-tender notes for customs dues, and do a great many other things which we have tried in vain to pass laws ordering him to do. He says that he will continue to issue interest-bearing bonds if necessary, even after resumption has taken place, to any amount he may think is required to maintain the payment in coin of the debts of the country. He further shows, and the facts are, that in his efforts at resumption, notwithstanding the monthly statements that he is largely and regularly reducing the public debt, that he is largely increasing the interest-bearing obligations. I hold his monthly statements in my hand for the month of November, 1875, November, 1876, November, 1877, and November, 1878, and the fact is shown in these reports that he has increased the bonded debt of the United States which bears interest, in the last three years, $104,499,450. He has increased the principal of the interest-bearing debt of the United States in the last year $76,816,000; and yet while these facts are true we are flattered by professions that the national debt is diminishing. The debt that bears the burden of interest has been increased over $104,000,000, and four millions and a half or five millions of interest has been annually added to the taxes of this people in the last three years in order to bring about this so-called resumption.

In November, 1875, the principal of the interest-bearing debt was $1,694,251,300; in November, 1878, it was $1,798,750,750.

Mr. MERRIMON. How has he done that?

Mr. BECK. He has done it by selling interest-bearing bonds and hoarding gold. You will see by his monthly statement and the report just laid before us that he is buying gold in large quantities for bonds. He says that he sold fifty millions of 4½ bonds in April last to a syndicate in New York and London when the people of the country were taking bonds at 4 per cent. to the amount of $102,000,000 during the last year, paying gold for them. By this operation the principal of the interest-bearing debt of the United States, which alone requires the imposition of tax burdens on the people, has been increased, according to the statement of the Secretary, $104,000,000 in the last three years, which interest adds to the taxation of the country nearly $5,000,000 annually. There may be a reduction in the total debt, but the non-interest-bearing debt, the legal-tender notes, the other currency that the people need and have to be taxed nothing for, have been diminished, to their detriment and to the contraction of the necessary currency; whereas the bonded debt, which is bearing interest, has been increased, as I have stated, $104,000,000. The Secretary further tells us that he intends to issue notes of large denominations on the 1st day of January next. Whether he means to withdraw small bills, he does not say. There are very many other things, which I will not even allude to, in that very able, but very remarkable, report, which the Senate ought to be fully advised about and ought to act upon before a recess is taken. It is to obtain information at once as to the use made of the silver coin received at the custom-house, so that we may take steps promptly to maintain the law in its integrity, and not allow either bankers or other interested associations to override it or to induce the Secretary to evade it, that I am pressing the resolution now laid before the Senate. I have no other object in view, and I feel assured that our action, if any is necessary, will control the future action of the Secretary in regard to the silver coin, the use of which for the purposes prescribed by law I shall endeavor to have maintained. That is all I desire to say at present.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I rose merely to say that if the Senator desired to make his explanation I had no objection to that; but I do object to the consideration of the resolution to-day. I have no doubt of the purpose of the Senator from Kentucky, and that purpose I think is to embarrass resumption. I desire to say that although the proposition made by the Senator from Kentucky is to call upon the Secretary of the Treasury to come here and make a personal explanation, I think that the present Secretary would not be embarrassed, even though that is a requirement that has not been demanded on the part of the Senate for eighty years past. I know of no instance where the Secretary of the Treasury has been asked to appear in person to make any explanation for the last eighty years. If the interest-bearing debt has been increased it has been done in strict accordance to law—it has been done solely to obtain coin for resumption purposes.

But it seems to me that it is not a reproach to the present Secretary that by his management there has been a reduction in the rate of interest by which bonds have been issued at 4 per cent. instead of 4½ per cent within the past year. I think that certainly is no reproach to the present Secretary. I am very certain that the Secretary has no objection to answering the Senator's resolution introduced some days ago; but it seems to me that it is asking a little too much that he should within so short a time be expected to make a reply to a resolution so comprehensive as the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky. I object to the consideration of the resolution to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over, not on the objection of the Senator from Vermont, but in point of time the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] interposed an objection when the Senator from Kentucky rose. The resolution goes over to-day.

Mr. MORRILL. I objected in the first instance.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate of December 5, 1878, a report of the commissioners of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company relative to the affairs of that company; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT RAILWAY COMPANIES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a communication from the president of the Metropolitan Railway Company, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 31st of May, 1878, transmitting a statement of the secretary and treasurer of that company showing the amount of capital stock, the amount of bonded and floating indebtedness, the gross and net earnings, operating expenses, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That when the House adjourns on Friday, the 20th instant, it stand adjourned until Monday, January 6, A. D. 1879.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish that to be laid aside until some other matters are ordered by the Senate, so that we may know just where we stand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be laid aside, there being objection to its present consideration.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. BURNSIDE. On Thursday next, after the morning hour, I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to make a few remarks upon the bill (S. No. 1491) to reduce and reorganize the Army of the United States and to make rules for its government and regulation. I will promise not to be longer than three-quarters of an hour and perhaps not so long. I shall ask the Senate to hear me on Thursday morning after the morning hour.

WARREN MITCHELL.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to give notice that on Wednesday morning, after the morning hour, I shall ask the Senate to consider the bill (S. No. 865) for the relief of Warren Mitchell.

Mr. GARLAND. I understand that notice has been given that the bill (S. No. 910) for the relief of the book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South will be called up on that day.

Mr. HARRIS. I am advised that notice is already given that another bill will be called up that morning. Therefore I will change my notice, then, to Tuesday (to-morrow) after the morning hour.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 5514) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872, and for former years, and for other purposes," approved May 18, 1872;

A bill (H. R. No. 5535) changing the time of holding the terms of the United States circuit court for the district of West Virginia;

A bill (H. R. No. 5532) authorizing the donation of twenty condemned bronze cannon to aid in the erection of a monument to the memory of General George A. Custer at the Military Academy at West Point; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 206) providing for the distribution of the Revised Statutes of the United States to the Post-Office Department.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1460) to authorize the issue of certain duplicate registered bonds for the benefit of the Manhattan Savings Institution.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in some and non-concurred in other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5230) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the printing of 3,000 copies each of volumes 3, 8, and 13 of the final reports of the Geological and Geographical Survey of the Territories, in quarto form, with the necessary illustrations; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the printing of 10,000 copies of Professor Hayden's twelfth annual report of the Geological and Geographical Survey of the Territories for 1878; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

EXERCISE OF ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.

Mr. BLAINE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolutions which I offered early in the session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves that the pending and all prior orders be laid aside and that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the resolutions, which will be read.

The resolutions submitted by Mr. BLAINE on the 2d instant were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate whether at the recent elections the constitutional rights of American citizens were violated in any of the States of the Union; whether the right of suffrage of citizens of the United States, or of any class of such citizens, was denied or abridged by the action of the election officers of any State in refusing to receive their votes, in failing to count them, or in receiving and counting fraudulent ballots in pursuance of a conspiracy to make the lawful votes of such citizens of noneffect; and whether such citizens were prevented from exercising the elective franchise, or forced to use it against their wishes, by violence or threats, or hostile demonstrations of armed men or other organizations, or by any other unlawful means or practices.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be further instructed to inquire and report whether it is within the competency of Congress to provide by additional legislation for the more perfect security of the right of suffrage to citizens of the United States in all the States of the Union.

Resolved, That in prosecuting these inquiries the Committee on the Judiciary shall have the right to send for persons and papers.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I am obliged to insist upon the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The special order of the day is the bill of the Senator from New Hampshire. The Senator from Maine moves to lay aside that special order and all prior orders.

Mr. BLAINE. My reason, Mr. President, I will state briefly, for I do not wish to detain the Senate in debating the question. If the resolutions are to have any effect, either those I have offered, or the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] it is quite important that both be adopted before the recess. I have no disposition to detain the Senate one minute upon them. All I desire is that they may be acted upon at a sufficiently early period of the session to give them some weight and effect. To postpone them until after the holidays is to run them until near the end of the session, and is merely to abandon the purpose and object in view.

Mr. GARLAND. I trust the Senator from Maine will not call up his resolutions until the Senator from Ohio who offered the amendment shall be in his seat. I do not know that it is his purpose to be heard upon the amendment, but he is absent from his seat at present. The Senator can call up the subject during the day.

Mr. WALLACE. I will state that the Senator from Ohio is detained from the Senate to-day by illness. He is unable to be here. I have a note from him to that effect.

Mr. BLAINE. The amendment is in and he has been heard upon it.

He loses no right by our proceeding. I should of course be the last one to show the slightest disrespect to the honorable Senator from Ohio, either present or absent.

Mr. GARLAND. I do not know whether he wishes to speak any further upon his amendment or not. The amendment was not printed when he made his speech, nor was the amendment before the Senate properly, but was merely ordered to be printed, and it then went over to a future day. So far as I myself am concerned, I am ready to vote on the resolutions and amendment now.

Mr. BLAINE. I think the Senator from Ohio intimated, if he did not state distinctly, that he had closed his remarks. That was my impression. I do not, however, state it except as a mere impression.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposition of the Senator from Maine is that the pending and all prior orders be laid aside and that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the resolutions just reported by the Secretary.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, from what inquiries I have made I am satisfied there will be very little debate upon Senate bill No. 300, and I entertain no doubt of our being able to dispose of it to-day. At the same time I recognize the force of what my friend the Senator from Maine has said in reference to the necessity of passing his resolutions prior to the adjournment for the holidays, if they are to pass at all. I am willing that the resolutions of the Senator from Maine be taken up subject to my call for the special order, which is Senate bill No. 300, and then if any Senator is prepared to speak upon the resolutions—and I have no doubt some intend to speak—he can go on with his speech, and then I can call up Senate bill No. 300.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. President, I dislike very much to antagonize the Senator from Maine in reference to the matter to which he has called the attention of the Senate, more especially as I think his resolutions ought to pass, and ought to pass before we take our recess. But nevertheless I feel constrained to make a motion to amend his motion, and that is, that all prior orders be laid aside for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 942, and I desire in submitting that motion to make one remark.

Prior to the close of the last session of this body, upon my motion, Senate bill No. 942 was postponed until the first Wednesday after the meeting of this body at this session, in order that it might be taken up and disposed of without coming in conflict with any other business that might be considered, of equal or superior importance. On the day designated I called the bill up, and objection was made to its consideration at that time on the ground that being the first week of the session the seats of Senators were not all full and that a measure of that importance ought not to be considered until there was a full attendance. I have delayed presenting the matter again, upon a notice, however, publicly given, that when the vote should be taken upon the bill introduced and supported by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] in reference to the counting of the electoral vote, I should then urge the Senate to take up the bill to which I have referred and dispose of it. I am charged by a committee of this body with the conduct of this bill, and therefore I feel that I ought to have the sense of the Senate without any further delay whether or not they will consider the bill at all. If they choose to refuse to entertain it, that is perhaps as convenient a way of passing upon its merits as I know of, and I am quite willing to accept the judgment of the Senate upon such a vote, and therefore I submit the motion as an amendment to that offered by the Senator from Maine, to substitute Senate bill No. 942 in his motion to displace all other orders.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio moves to amend the proposition of the Senator from Maine, so that the Senate shall proceed at this time to the consideration of the bill named by him.

Mr. MATTHEWS. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORRILL. Is that in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair holds that it is in order. The Senator from Ohio asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to say to the Senator from Ohio that while I am entirely willing to assist him in taking up his bill at any proper moment, I cannot vote for taking it up as against Senate bill No. 300, which is before the Senate as the regular order of business. I hope he will defer the time for calling this matter up on that account.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Armstrong,	Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Patterson,
Bailey,	Eustis,	Lamar,	Randolph,

So the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Shall I understand that the Senator from Maine accepted the proposition which I made?

Mr. BLAINE. Will the Senator state the proposition?

Mr. WADLEIGH. That Senate bill No. 300 be laid aside informally subject to call.

Mr. BLAINE. I suppose under the rules of the Senate if these resolutions are taken up now the bill of the Senator from New Hampshire does not lose its place, but comes up as soon as the resolutions are disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The rights of the bill attach upon the disposition of the resolutions, the Chair holds.

Mr. BLAINE. If this order is made does it lose its place?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It does not. It will come up immediately after this order shall have been disposed of.

Mr. BLAINE. That is what I understood.

Mr. WADLEIGH. But it may be that Senators have speeches to make on the resolutions of my friend from Maine which they are not ready to make, and in such a case I should desire to put the bill in.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course if there is any gap I am as willing the Senator should occupy it as anybody else.

Mr. WADLEIGH. With that understanding, I do not object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions.

Mr. WHYTE. I rise to ask a parliamentary question. Has not any Senator a right to call for the special order now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate has already decided to set it aside and all prior orders, and the resolutions of the Senator from Maine are before the Senate.

Mr. WHYTE. Subject to call for the regular order, as I understood. I understood that was part of the contract.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate has decided that it will set aside the special order and all prior orders and proceed now to the consideration of the resolutions of the Senator from Maine, which are before the Senate.

Mr. WHYTE. Now, how long is that to last? Has not a Senator a right to call for the special order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Not until these resolutions be disposed of or otherwise ordered by the Senate. The pending question is upon the amendment proposed as an addition by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] which will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

The committee shall also inquire whether any citizen of any State has been dismissed or threatened with dismissal from employment or deprivation of any right or privilege by reason of his vote or intention to vote at the recent elections, or has been otherwise interfered with.

And to inquire whether in the year 1878 money was raised by assessment or otherwise upon Federal office-holders or employés for election purposes, and under what circumstances and by what means; and, if so, what amount was so raised and how the same was expended; and, further, whether such assessments were or not in violation of law.

And shall further inquire into the action and conduct of United States supervisors of elections in the several States; and as to the number of marshals, deputy marshals, and others employed to take part in the conduct of the said elections; in what State or city appointed; the amount of money paid or promised to be paid to them, and how or by whom and under what law authorized.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, I move to lay the resolutions and accompanying amendment on the table, and upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Pennsylvania desires a test vote on whether the Senate will further entertain the subject.

Mr. WALLACE. I move to lay on the table the resolutions and the amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. I am willing to have it that way.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 3, nays 60; as follows:

YEAS—3.

Davis of West Va.,	McCreery,	Wallace.

NAYS—60.

Allison,	Coke,	Howe,	Morgan,

Edmunds,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BLAINE. I have not the slightest objection to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio; but I wish to make this suggestion, that I think there ought to be another committee to take charge of it. There is a very great abundance of labor both in the proposition which I submitted and in the proposition which the honorable Senator from Ohio submits for a committee; and if you have only one committee for both, beginning with the dispute which way they will turn their faces first upon distinct fields of investigation, you will have a conflict which might just as well be avoided. If the Senate is ready now to take a vote on both propositions, both the amendment of the Senator from Ohio and the resolutions I offered, I have no objection, if there are no gentlemen who are going to address the Senate upon the subject. If there is to be delay to accommodate Senators I would ask that this question lie over until to-morrow until it may be adjusted in harmony on both sides. I do not expect there will be any difference of opinion about it. If any gentleman desires to address the Senate on the general subject, I hope it will be before the question is put on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. KERNAN. I trust we shall adopt the amendment to the resolutions and send it to the same committee. It is a good committee. They can easily have subcommittees taking evidence on different points, as they do constantly. I think the inquiries ought to be put together and sent to the same committee. They will have no difficulty in examining into them by subcommittees.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, but it seems to me there are two words here which ought to be stricken out. There is to be an inquiry as to "whether in the year 1878 money was raised by assessment or otherwise upon Federal office-holders." I do not suppose the Senator from Ohio means to inquire whether a Federal office-holder voluntarily contributed to the election of an officer.

Mr. VOORHEES. I think he does.

Mr. ALLISON. That he means to make a general inquiry as to whether the Senator from Indiana, for instance, made a contribution?

Mr. VOORHEES. And how much was raised in that way, and what was done with it.

Mr. ALLISON. By voluntary contributions?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, sir, by voluntary contributions for the purpose of corrupting the ballot-box.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana, as he seems to understand the amendment, whether or not this applies to members of the Senate and House?

Mr. VOORHEES. I presume it does. I hope it does at least.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw any objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to the resolutions as amended?

Mr. BAYARD. I propose to amend the first resolution, in line 6, by inserting after "any State" the words "or of the United States;" so as to read:

> Whether the right of suffrage of citizens of the United States, or of any class of such citizens, was denied or abridged by the action of the election officers of any State, or of the United States, in refusing to receive their votes.

This will make the inquiry include both officers of the State and of the United States, who were election officers.

Mr. BLAINE. I have no objection to that. I hope there will be no objection to that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Delaware. The resolutions are so modified.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire what committee is charged with this inquiry?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If the Chair remembers correctly, the Committee on the Judiciary. [Examining the resolutions.] It is the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest that if either branch of this inquiry is to proceed, a special committee should be charged with it. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. EDMUNDS] is not here. There are several members of that committee here, and they all know, as I know, that committee is already, I might say, smothered under labor and duties which are put in its charge; and the idea that during this session of Congress either alternative of this inquiry is to be conducted by that committee possibly—my friend before me [Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois] says "properly" but I say possibly—seems to me so improbable that I venture to call the attention of the Senate to it. Believing as I do that this inquiry ought to be made, and believing further that there is great force in the suggestion that any one single committee will be greatly embarrassed, to say the least, by an attempt to hold all the inquisition here directed, it seems to me that the inquiry ought not to be committed to a standing committee, which committee we know in advance is obstructed already by labors making demands upon its time beyond its possibility to comply. And I will venture to add that there are no seven men, whether they be the members of the Judiciary Committee or a court or a commission, who, in the time available between now and the 4th of March to the Judiciary Committee, could by any diligence dispose intelligently, conscientiously, and thoroughly of the matters in charge of that committee without reference to this; and my honorable friend before me [Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois] concurs in and confirms me in that statement.

Now in respect of an inquiry which both sides of the Chamber profess to deem important and urgent because entire unanimity has been found in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio and there was entire unanimity before on this side of the Chamber in favor of the original resolutions, it is proposed that the instrumentality by which that inquiry shall be made, shall be selected, not in view, I think, of its efficiency in the measure of the time it can devote to it, but in the presence at least, if not in view, of the fact that other things will stand in the way so as probably to block the efficient conduct of the inquiry.

Mr. President, though with some hesitation, as the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary is absent, unless some other Senator will submit an amendment to test the sense of the Senate, I think I ought to ask the judgment of the Senate upon the question whether that inquiry should not go to a special committee. If a special committee were constituted by the Chair, he would no doubt look, as he always does in the selection, to the adaptation of Senators to the purpose, and one of the elements in the case would be the extent to which their time is necessarily required otherwise, and I think a special committee could be composed of men who would not be embarrassed by so many other duties as rest upon members of the Judiciary Committee. So that unless I stand in the way of the purpose of those who more especially have charge of the resolution, I will venture to submit an amendment striking out "the Committee on the Judiciary" and inserting "a select committee consisting of seven," or nine, or any number of Senators. ["Nine!" "Nine!"] Friends on this side suggest nine. I will make it "nine members of the Senate," and I will say "to be appointed by the Chair," or I will leave that without suggestion to the end that some other Senator may make a proposition.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President, it seems to me that the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] ought not to prevail, for the reason that one of these resolutions provides for an examination into and report upon a very grave question. Some doubt must have arisen in the mind of the Senator from Maine, the author of the original resolutions, who desired that doubt solved, as to the power of Congress to pass other laws than those we have, or different laws than those we have upon the subjects embraced in the resolutions; and it seems to me very appropriate that such an inquiry should go to the Judiciary Committee. The Senator from Maine has selected that committee, and I think with great propriety. One of the questions submitted by the Senator is a grave one, and it should be passed upon by the legal committee of this body. Whatever they may report upon that question will of course have more influence than a report from any other committee on a kindred subject. The mover of the amendment is also a member of the Judiciary Committee. I hope, Mr. President, that the motion of the Senator from New York will not prevail, but that the original resolutions as proposed by the Senator from Maine and as amended by the Senate will pass.

Mr. MCDONALD. Mr. President, as a member of the Judiciary Committee I deem it my duty to state that if these resolutions go to that committee they will necessarily supersede all other business before that committee for this session. In fact I should myself deem it a special order to give up all other labor to execute this command of the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. There has been some talk informally on this side of the Chamber heretofore in regard to a select committee, on the ground, as has been suggested by the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from New York, of the overburdened condition of the business before the Judiciary Committee. I am entirely willing to have the change made. I would have moved it myself, but for the fact that I do not desire to be chairman or even a member of the committee, and the person who moves a select committee is under some sort of honorable obligation under certain circumstances to accept the chairmanship. I have no objection to the change. I merely make this suggestion, that the committee be ten, with power to make subcommittees. That will attain the object which I threw out in some previous remarks this morning.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, a suggestion has fallen upon my ear which informs me that I have exposed myself imprudently; and I can only say that following, as I usually do, my distinguished friend before me [Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois] if I have brought myself into difficulty, he and not I is to blame. I am so accustomed to following his suggestions that I naturally fell into that habit on this occasion and interposed in behalf of the Judiciary Committee. I wish now before losing another moment, to say that in moving this amendment I did not intend, however remotely, to implicate myself or to become one of the possibilities of membership of this committee, and I would rather withdraw the amendment than to have the Chair or anybody else understand that by moving it I assumed any position upon the committee, and least of all a willingness to act as chairman of the committee. I suppose nobody would wish that; but owing to my own position upon the Judiciary Committee and upon another, the objections which are applicable to the other members of the Judiciary Committee would certainly be applicable to me; and therefore, if I let the amendment stand, I beg to do so, nobody failing to know that I shall ask to be excused myself from service upon the committee at either end or in the middle of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from New York is that the subjects-matter of the pending resolutions be committed to a select committee to consist of nine Senators, instead of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope the number will be ten.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves to amend by making the number ten. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The question having been put, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail, and a division was called for.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, having asked for the yeas and nays I beg to submit one remark, which is that the pending amendment is the best test I can think of of the earnestness and intention of the Senate. Those who want this inquiry made in either or both of its branches must I think want a committee employed in its examination. Those who want it to fail can at this stage of the proceeding most effectually accomplish their object by committing it to a committee so burdened already that it cannot discharge the duty.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that on all political questions my colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN.] I do not know but that this may be regarded as a political question.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say that on all political questions I understand the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.] I do not know whether this is a political question or not.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Iowa is entirely correct. If this is to be regarded as a political question I am paired with the Senator from California; otherwise I would rather have my vote recorded. I did not so regard it, and therefore voted. If the honorable Senator insists upon it I, of course, shall withdraw my vote.

Mr. ALLISON. I will not insist upon it.

Mr. MAXEY. I voted under the belief and I yet believe, that this is not a political question; otherwise I should regard myself as paired. I deem this a question of sound judgment and nothing else.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not understand the question to be political; but inasmuch as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] made the suggestion he did, I thought it was due to the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] that I should call the attention of the Senate to the fact that he is paired on political questions.

Mr. BUTLER. I am quite willing to withdraw my vote if the Senator insists upon it.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not.

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 27; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As thus amended, will the Senate agree to the resolutions?

Mr. BLAINE. Let the first part of the resolutions be read as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee, to consist of nine Senators, be appointed to inquire and report to the Senate——

Mr. BLAINE. Let "by the Chair" be put in after "appointed," by general consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine?

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. Now, two or three little matters are needed to make the resolutions harmonious. The third clause of the original resolutions offered to the Senate should now come at the end, after that portion adopted on the motion of the Senator from Ohio. I refer to that which now reads:

Resolved, That in prosecuting these inquiries the committee shall have the right to send for persons and papers.

There should be added:

To take testimony by subcommittee and to visit any portion of the country when such visit may in their judgment facilitate the object of the inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. First, is there any objection to the transposition proposed by the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BAYARD. Let the amendment be reported from the Chair.

Mr. BLAINE. My colleague suggests that the authority to the subcommittee to take testimony should also include power to administer oaths. I supposed that would be included in the right to take testimony; but to be precise, perhaps it had better be in.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks first a transposition——

Mr. KERNAN. Is that to transpose the amendment to the end of the original resolutions as offered?

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from New York will observe that the third clause of the original resolutions, which concludes them, should now be placed after the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, which has been adopted by the Senate.

Mr. KERNAN. As I understand the amendment comes in at the end of the first resolution so that it will stand as a part of the first resolve. Am I right?

Mr. BLAINE. The amendment that has just been adopted?

Mr. KERNAN. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BLAINE. The amendment will come in after the second clause, I think.

Mr. KERNAN. I think it ought to be part of the first resolution, so as to show at once what authority there is as to both branches of the inquiry.

Mr. BLAINE. I have no objection. Let the portion added by the Senator from Ohio come in after the first resolution.

Mr. KERNAN. All right, then.

Mr. BLAINE. Then the two subsequent clauses follow, and then I move an amendment at the end of the last clause to add these words:

To take testimony and administer oaths by subcommittees, and to visit any portion of the country when such visit may in their judgment facilitate the object of the inquiry.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Maine to modify his amendment so as to say that the special committee by itself, or by any subcommittee of their number, shall have the right, so that all the powers conferred upon the committee shall be in the subcommittee.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator from Massachusetts will write out his amendment as he has suggested it, I shall be very glad to have it substituted for what I have moved.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Maine to consent to one additional amendment after his, "that said committ be structed to sit with open doors?"

Mr. BLAINE. Of course——

Mr. BUTLER. Will the honorable Senator include that in his amendment, "that the committee or subcommittee be instructed to sit with open doors?"

Mr. HOAR. That ought to be left to their discretion.

Mr. BLAINE. I think there is a good deal under that suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina. He will pardon me for not inserting it.

Mr. BUTLER. I am perfectly earnest in making the suggestion.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the Senator explain the motive of it?

Mr. BUTLER. My motive is to have a perfectly fair, impartial, and open investigation. That is my object.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from South Carolina will observe that this committee will undoubtedly have a fair and full representation of the minority of the Senate, or of the other side—I do not know whether it is a minority or not. [Laughter.] Both political parties and all shades of political opinion that sit on this floor will be represented on the committee. Now, I can conceive a case, I think I can go a little further and say that I have heard of a good many cases, in which the committee would be embarrassed by having witnesses come before them who did not want to testify openly. There certainly could be no partisan advantage gained if so active and vigilant an eye as that of the Senator from South Carolina was on the minority, and so of many other Senators whom I might name; then no harm could come to the inquiry in that respect. But the Senator is not unaware, surely, that one of the alleged, if not actual, troubles in the whole investigation of the southern question has been that the very men who were intimidated at the polls were still more intimidated on the witness stand; and therefore I would leave that matter altogether to the discretion of the committee. I would neither bind them the one way nor the other. Let them be the judges as to what the propriety of the case demands in this respect.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand, then, the Senator to state that he objects to that addition to his amendment upon the ground that there may be in certain parts of this country some witnesses who would not desire to testify openly, but who would be willing to testify secretly. That I understand to be the position of the Senator. I do not know, Mr. President, for one, any part of this country where that state of things exists. The Senator says that it is alleged. Like a great many other allegations, it is entirely without any proof to sustain it. I respectfully submit to the Senator that he has not one particle of proof, and if he desires (and I have no right to question but that he does desire) a free, full, complete, thorough, public investigation of this question, I cannot see why he should object to my amendment.

So far as I am concerned, as a representative in part of South Carolina, I wish to say to the Senator, to the Senate, and to the country, since he has chosen to select and single out my State as the special object for this investigation, that we desire the most complete and the fullest investigation we can get; and I can say to the Senator that any witness who goes before the committee in South Carolina may do so just as safely and may testify as fully as he can in the State of Maine.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, I desire to state to the Senator from Maine, so far as any investigation in Louisiana is concerned, the past investigations prove that republican witnesses are not intimidated, because republican witnesses not only testify, but a great many testify on both sides. [Laughter.] Therefore I can see no objection to having this investigation a public investigation.

It was not my intention to reply to the remarks made by the Senator from Maine, because whether or not there has been intimidation is a question of fact and not a question of conjecture or guesswork or partisan statement, and therefore it occurred to me as a very extraordinary position for the honorable Senator from Maine to occupy that in advance of the examination of a single witness, in the absence of a single inquiry, as the introducer of the resolution asking for an investigation, which implies that there has been so far no sustained fact upon which to base an accusation, the honorable Senator should take the liberty of stating to the Senate and to the people that the colored citizens of the State of Louisiana had no more rights as suffragans and as voters than the inhabitants of Senegambia. I could very easily demonstrate if this were a proper time that the election in Louisiana, so far as results are concerned, either as to the general State ticket or as to the congressional elections, was a fair and a peaceable election, and that there were a great many reasons why the democratic nominees were elected; and I could also demonstrate that the colored people selected their choice as to congressional candidates and exercised their choice as to legislative candidates, showing that they exercised a discrimination in the matter.

But it is not my purpose, Mr. President, to detain the Senate at this time. After the investigation, which I have no doubt will prove that the allegation of the honorable Senator from Maine against the people of Louisiana is entirely unfounded, I shall have the opportunity of defending my people against this oft-repeated but oft-refuted denunciation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BUTLER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. I have no desire to prolong the debate; but the Senator from South Carolina either possesses or affects great ignorance of past events. He certainly ought to know that one of the primal troubles in every investigation South has been the very one on which I have commented. I used the word "alleged" because I wanted to put it in as mild a form as possible. I might have used the word "proved" or "recorded" in congressional reports accessible to him as to every other Senator; but in advance of the investigation which the Senate is to order I do not care to go into particulars. I have had as many as two hundred letters from the South giving details of great outrages upon the right of suffrage; many from the State of the Senator who last spoke. I do not adduce them or parade them here. They at least form the basis, in connection with that which has become matter of public notoriety, of a serious and sober investigation; and if the Senator from Louisiana does not know that a great massacre occurred in one of the parishes of his own State on the last election day, he is probably the only gentleman in the United States who is ignorant of it. It is very well to walk through this world in a vain show, with eyes that see not and ears that hear not; but I say to the honorable Senator from South Carolina and to the honorable Senator from Louisiana that the attention of the whole United States has been aroused by what has transpired in the Southern States; aroused by the fact that the elections in the Southern States this year were without the slightest pretense of interference from the outside, that which the South had complained of as an invasion and an infraction of their rights had, wisely or unwisely, been wholly withdrawn, and assurances had been given as solemn as the word of honor could be passed that the rights of every voter should be respected through the length and breadth of those States; and I say to the Senators from those States that the popular and general belief of this country is to the contrary.

I will not indulge in denunciation; I will not use an epithet; but I say to the honorable Senators on the point immediately to be voted upon by the Senate, that if they desire an investigation free from intimidation, if they desire an investigation before a tribunal with jealous eyes of both political parties, free to hold such sessions as shall protect the witness then and after, they will leave it to the discretion of the committee, and not send forth from Washington on the day the resolutions are passed a proclamation to every timid white man and every timid black man in the South that if he dares appear before the committee he must do it publicly and be branded by those whom he may offend.

Mr. BUTLER. And I say to the Senator that if he desires, as he claims to desire, and as I have no right to deny that he does desire, a fair, full, free, complete investigation, he will vote for the amendment which I have offered.

The Senator from Maine sees fit to get up and repeat, without one particle of proof to sustain the allegation, somewhat of the character of his remarks the other day in presenting his resolutions. He says he has two hundred letters from people in the South giving evidence of intimidation and fraud and wrong and riot and murder. Why, Mr. President, I understood the Senator to say the other day, and if I am mistaken I hope he will correct me, that he based his statements upon the newspapers of the country. Well, now, Mr. President, I submit in all frankness and in all kindness to the Senator that if he based his statements upon the newspaper press alone, he and I should have been hung and quartered long ago. [Laughter.] It is not safe for the Senator to base his opinions and his statements and his allegations upon any such authority; not that I mean to say that the newspapers do not communicate the truth, but I do mean to say that when correspondents are sent into a country, as they have been into my country, to make a case, to write down all that is bad about our people and to suppress all that is meritorious, the accounts they send are unreliable. I say to the honorable Senator that with the same feeling and with the same spirit I could go into his State with a corps of detectives and I could make his State a stench in the nostrils of the civilized world.

Mr. BLAINE. You have the authority under these resolutions to do it.

Mr. BUTLER. I say I could do that; yet when I propose to open the doors of the committee to permit everybody to go in who has the right to go, whom the committee will permit to go, to allow the witnesses to be cross-examined, the Senator attempts to answer that by saying that witnesses white and colored will be notified that they do that at their peril. I say, Mr. President, that that is not true so far as South Carolina is concerned. I say that it is absolutely untrue. I do not mean this in an offensive sense to the honorable Senator, but I submit and assert upon my responsibility here that a witness may testify before a committee with open doors as freely in my State, and I believe in every other Southern State, as he can in the State of Maine or Massachusetts, and I can see no earthly objection to this committee being instructed to sit with open doors in order that the whole world may see and know what is being done; and I do not mean by that to make any reflection upon the committee. It is quite true that both parties will be represented, I have no doubt; but I think it unwise, and I think it wrong in principle for any committee in a free country like this to sit and take testimony with closed doors upon any subject which affects the people.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina he demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the amendment be reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is that this committee be directed to sit with open doors.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MCDONALD, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DORSEY] on political questions, and as this seems to be taking a political direction, I shall not vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MAXEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPENCER] on political questions. I cannot see that this is a political question, but under the circumstances I shall not vote.

Mr. MORRILL, (when Mr. THURMAN'S name was called.) I desire to say that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] and my colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] are both absent and paired on political questions. I think this has got to be a political question.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BUTLER, (who had voted in the affirmative.) I ought to withdraw my vote. At the moment it did not occur to me that on this question I should have to ask my friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to decide whether I should vote, as he requested me to pair with the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT.] As the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] says, it appears that this is assuming a political aspect.

Mr. ALLISON. I dislike very much to decide that question for the Senator from South Carolina. I think I must refer him to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] and the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY,] who have both declined to vote.

Mr. BUTLER. I then withdraw my vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina withdraws his vote.

Mr. BARNUM. I am paired on all political questions with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. CHAFFEE.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced, as follows:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. On the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] the yeas are 30 and the nays are 30. The amendment is rejected; and the question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.]

Mr. HOAR. The amendment as proposed by the Senator from Maine does not confer upon the subcommittees the whole power——

Mr. BLAINE. I have put these words in, "by itself or by any subcommittee."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That in prosecuting these inquiries the Judiciary Committee shall have the right to send for persons and papers, to take testimony by itself or by any subcommittee, and to administer oaths, to visit any portion of the country when such visit may in their judgment facilitate the object of the inquiry.

Mr. HOAR. The words should come in after "have the right."

Mr. McDONALD. "Judiciary Committee" is in the amendment. I move that it be stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be stricken out and made to correspond with the text without further motion.

Mr. HOAR. The Clerk did not read the amendment correctly.

Mr. KERNAN. I ask that the amendment be read again as amended. We could not hear it here.

Mr. HOAR. The words "by itself or by a subcommittee" should come in after the words "have the right," so that the subcommittee will have all the powers of the original committee delegated to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again reported.

The Secretary read as follows:

That in prosecuting these inquiries the said committee shall have the right, by itself or by any subcommittee, to send for persons and papers, to take testimony, to administer oaths, and to visit any portion of the country when such visit may in their judgment facilitate the object of the inquiry.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I presume it will be in order to amend the amendment of the Senator from Maine with the words "shall sit with open doors if any member of the committee desires."

Mr. BLAINE. "If the committee so determine" would be better.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No; if any member of the committee desires it. I make that motion.

Mr. BLAINE. That is exactly the same proposition we have just voted on.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Oh, no; it is not the same; it is quite different.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia proposes an amendment stated by him in his place.

A division was called for.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TELLER. Let the amendment be reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from West Virginia will be reported; or will he state it again?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is to insert "and shall sit with open doors if any member of the committee or subcommittee desires it." The Clerk can take it down. My friend before me [Mr. WHYTE] suggests that I say "whenever desired by any member of the committee."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment just stated, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. Have the yeas and nays been asked for upon that amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They have been ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. The action of the Senate upon the resolutions and all the amendments has had the mark almost of unanimity. Why shall it not be continued in respect of this proposition? The system of taking testimony in courts of justice is invariably open; and if there ever was an inquisition as to fact which ought to be public, it surely is that which touches the affairs of a whole community. Ordinarily in contests as to rights between individuals, issues of fact are created by pleadings, so that some degree of certainty is brought to every mind, and we know the subjects-matter and general character of the testimony to be expected. But here is little else than an indictment of communities as a whole, vague, uncertain, and surely there is the spirit of fair play which dictates that, if you strike, you at least shall hear. There is something un-American in secret inquisition, something in the proposition that is repugnant to a sense of justice. If the charges are true, I hope that exposure will follow, and that punishment may follow exposure. If they be untrue, I hope they may recoil on those who unjustly set them on foot. But the truth is something that no honest man should fear; and believing that this proposition to try whole communities upon vague and general charges calls especially for open and public investigation of the facts, I do hope that the Senate will unanimously agree that no such thing as a secret inquisition shall be held upon such a state of facts as is alleged by those who have moved this proceeding.

I have been by the direction of the Senate assigned to duty upon every committee of this public character of inquisition since 1870. The first was in the State of North Carolina; next there followed a joint committee of the two Houses, twenty-one in number, upon all the Southern States; again followed a special committee in respect to the State of Mississippi. All of that testimony was taken in secret; all of that testimony was taken in short-hand and fully published. There was then the same proposition made that we should sit with open doors that the communities who were to be assailed should hear at least what was said against them that they might reply, but the majority of those who controlled those investigations forbade it, and men came and swore to anything they pleased, assailing men who were absent uninformed of the time, unprepared to meet it, and unable to meet it simply from want of knowledge of what had been said.

Mr. BLAINE. May I ask the Senator a question just there?

Mr. BAYARD. One word further. All this testimony was published, published in full, and I have never heard in the succeeding cases where committees have visited again those States that the publication of the testimony in full ever produced any breach of the peace whatever.

Mr. BLAINE. May I ask the honorable Senator a question?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. Before any of these committees of which he has been a member did he ever know testimony affecting the character of an individual submitted which that individual, through himself or counsel, did not have some opportunity to review and rebut?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, sir. I can tell him there was no case except it came through the action of a member of the committee who might choose to summon the man assailed.

Mr. BLAINE. Was he not summoned?

Mr. BAYARD. Sometimes he was and sometimes he was not.

Mr. BLAINE. What I want to get at is this: whenever it was regarded as essential to the protection of the reputation of any man was it not invariably the rule that any one assailed was summoned?

Mr. BAYARD. I cannot say that any such rule prevailed. I mean to say that where a subpœna was asked for I never knew it refused.

Mr. BLAINE. That is what I mean. Now, as the Senator will observe, just as in those committees so in this both political parties will be represented, and they will use their discretion; but if you by a rule beforehand say that under no circumstances shall they hold a closed-door meeting you have taken all proper responsibility from them. You have taken from them any exercise of discretion whatever.

Mr. BAYARD. I do hold that any man, however humble, however poor, has a right to be confronted with the witnesses against him. He has a right to know the charge against him. This proceeding is, as I say, an indictment against a whole people; it is a railing accusation; therefore the more difficult to meet, and therefore the proof in regard to it ought to be open especially. The Senator must see, I submit to his candor, to his sense of fairness, that a man may come in burning with partisan dislike and make false charges against one hundred and fifty men; the Senator or I on that committee have no knowledge of the facts save that which the witness chooses to give us; power of cross-examination we have none, because we have not the knowledge to conduct a cross-examination. There is something in this which strikes my sense of justice and offends it. I would not wish to do by another what I would not have done by me; and I can understand that if my character were to be assailed in secret without the opportunity of cross-examination, I should feel it exceedingly unjust were I not to be fully informed of it all and be there at the time that I might defend myself.

I believe I have already referred to the fact that the most voluminous testimony has been in print for several years, taken at different dates—depositions of witnesses examined and cross-examined in private. They all have been in private; none that I know of, in which there has not been a refusal to allow these matters to be public, although they were subsequently fully published without injury to any one; and yet I believe great injustice was done by that method of taking testimony. There is not, I believe, a State in this Union in which the reputation, or the person, or the property of the humblest man in it could be assailed in a manner to affect either by testimony taken in secret.

I was sorry just now when a vote was taken to hear gentlemen admit or suggest that this was a party question. It ought not to be, and the votes that I have given have been given with the intent of preventing it from being such. I have not discussed the resolutions or the objections that I would have to them. I have chosen rather to divest the matter of anything of a party character, because it is a question to be tried at the bar of a great and I trust a sound and a just public opinion. And therefore it was that I rose, hoping that the call for the yeas and nays would be withdrawn, that there might be a concurrence all over the Chamber in conducting this investigation upon the principle that justice everywhere lays down for the elucidation of truth.

There is something in secrecy, as I say, unfair and un-American. The suggestion that witnesses would be prevented by their fears from giving testimony is answered fully by the fact that all these affidavits and depositions are published in full and have been published in full immediately after being taken, and copies of them sent back and read and reread and inquired for anxiously by men; and I know from my own experience personally, having discussed with gentlemen of the vicinity whom I never had known before the investigation, whom I could not see or know during the investigation—the facts disclosed and learned from them that if they only had had the opportunity of knowing that such facts had been alleged the means for their contradiction were ready and abundant. Of course, as my friend from New York [Mr. KERNAN] suggests, to draw out the other side of any question—and there are two sides to every question, there must be knowledge and information in the party questioning. Two Senators equally honorable, and equally well-intentioned, go down and hear what? Testimony, I trust not prearranged, but call on a man generally to hear what he knows in respect of such charges as are set forth in this paper. Well, he implicates, for instance, individuals; he makes statements regarding them, he charges them with violations of law and invasion of private rights respecting suffrage; he may not only charge one he may charge a hundred. It would be a matter of impossibility to summon all those men, and when you summon them you summon them too late. The time for the knowledge that could meet and expose the partiality, the perversion or the untruth of the statement is at the time a man makes it. Any man accustomed to the examination of witnesses knows that without a cross-examination testimony is wholly unreliable. It is an old saying that you may prove anything by ex parte affidavits. Why? Because the witness is not subject to cross-examination. Constantly, over and over again, testimony wholly destructive to life or property or right melts away under the light of cross-examination disclosing the motives of the witness, the restraint he is under, and so on; and to conduct that, you must have a knowledge at the time he testifies. It will not do to let him go off the stand and then call a man whom he has impeached from a distance and by the vague recollection of a Senator or Representative repeat to him what has been said. It was his right to be there where he was attacked; it was his right to go to some gentleman, the Senator from Maine, or some other who was there, and say, "Ask this question for me, sir, when this man charges me with a wrong, I ask you to put to him this crucial question." With closed doors that cannot be done. In the open American fashion of taking testimony, it can be done; and therefore I submit to honorable Senators on the other side of the Chamber, this is not a question that is fit to be touched by the spirit or feeling of party. The principles of eternal justice are involved in the manner in which this investigation shall be conducted. It is not for parties, it is for the principles of justice; and it cannot be that such an examination as this and such an inquiry as this shall stand as an exception to every other human inquiry for which tribunals of justice all over this land are erected and to the principles of which they are compelled to conform.

There is no fact, however sad, however discreditable, which, if it be true, I should not be willing to see brought to light and join in condemnation and aid so far as law will go with punishment; but let us not forsake the beautiful principle of justice in the pursuit of facts. Let the examination be open, let it be above-board; do not let it be secret.

I say what I have said in the interest of justice and not in the name of party. I was sorry to hear this called a party question. I do not believe it ought to be a party question. So far as I am concerned, I will not let it be a party question.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish simply to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the proposition made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] and now renewed by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] is in opposition to the uniform precedents both of the Senate and the House in all like cases since the foundation of the Government. It is in opposition to the uniform precedents in regard to original investigations wherever criminal or unlawful conduct is charged.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. I was a member of a committee which sat six weeks in the city of New York investigating the custom-house affairs there. That examination was public and made so by the committee.

Mr. HOAR. I understood the Senator from Delaware himself to say that in all the investigations of this character in which he had borne a part the investigation had been, as proposed by the original resolution, left to the discretion of the committee. I ask the Senator from Delaware whether in regard to the custom-house investigation of which he speaks the question whether the public interest required the session to be secret or open was not left to the discretion of the committee?

Mr. BAYARD. It was decided by the committee to sit with open doors.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. There was nothing said about it in the original resolution.

Mr. HOAR. That is the precise point which I was making.

Mr. BLAINE. That is it exactly.

Mr. HOAR. In every instance the matter has been left to the discretion of the committee, with the single exception of the famous Credit Mobilier investigation, and the experience of the House of Representatives in that particular case induced the House, the democratic House, to return to the old custom, which has never been observed more strictly than during the past two Congresses in the other branch. The reason is obvious. In seeking to discover criminal or unlawful conduct the tribunal making the investigation must avail itself frequently and very largely of hostile sources of information, and the examination of one witness having put them on the trace of a fact, every other witness who knows that fact, but who desires to keep it secret, is put on his guard if the investigation is open, and flies from the summons of the committee. It is utterly impossible to trace to the bottom many of the transactions of the kind contemplated in these resolutions, unless the committee have the discretion to make, in the first instance, as far as they find the interests of justice require it, their investigations secret.

If in the end it turns out that this committee report conclusions of fact affecting injuriously the character of any individual, of any community, or of any State, without giving the fullest opportunity to those concerned to encounter by opposing testimony if they can, to sift by cross-examination at a proper time, the narrative of the witnesses on which the committee rely, the effect of such a report would be to condemn the committee who had made it, and to deprive their conclusions of all authority in the estimation of the Senate or of the country.

I trust, in response to what the honorable Senator from Delaware has suggested, that we shall have a unanimity in the Senate, but that that unanimity will be in following the uniform precedents which the experiences of this body in all like cases from the foundation of the Government have shown to be necessary, that is, that the tribunal charged with the investigation shall have the power to make its investigations secret so far as the interests of justice and of a full and thorough investigation demand, and then to make its investigation open and public when the interests of justice or of fullness and thoroughness of examination shall demand. It is not credible that any committee of the Senate would bring back a report exposed to the criticism which the honorable Senator from Delaware has made; and if it should it is not credible that either Senate or country would attach any weight to a conclusion so reached. We may be quite sure that any committee composed of members of this body will regard the primal rules of justice in giving every party inculpated opportunity to meet the accusation before their final conclusion is reported. We may be quite sure that any committee appointed by this body will regard the universal experience of all such inquiries, whether made by grand juries or by legislative bodies, in sometimes, in the first instance, concealing the progress they have made in the investigation from the knowledge of those concerned to defeat or baffle their inquiries.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, it will be observed, and I supposed that it would satisfy every one on the other side, that this is somewhat different from the proposition we voted upon. I thought we ought to adopt that, and that this investigation should be with open doors; but now the proposition is that if one of the members whom you send from this body on this committee shall request that the investigation be with open doors the doors shall be opened. The object of the present amendment is to prevent a majority from closing the doors and having the investigation in secret; that if one of the number of men whom you send out of this body as the committee thinks it ought to be open and asks that it shall not be secret the investigation shall not be secret. Surely the Senate is not going to place upon the committee any gentleman who for any mischievous purpose would desire to have the investigation open. If one of those sitting as a committee and who must act is of the opinion that for the sake of coming at the truth fully and fairly the witnesses should be examined in open session, then the examination of witnesses should not be in secret. Indeed, I do not think the witnesses should be examined in secret session if all the members of the committee were in favor of doing so. Certainly a majority of the committee should not have power to do so.

This investigation for all practical purposes is to be final. Is there to be any other day in court for the communities accused or the individuals accused practically to cross-examine witnesses or produce testimony than before this committee? We send the committee there that its members may hear evidence, come to a conclusion, and report to us the fact and their opinion as to what legislation, if any, there should be to correct evils if they exist.

Inasmuch as it turns out from the statement of Senators here that heretofore some of the investigating committees who made reports, and whose investigations for all practical purposes were final action, did refuse to take the testimony publicly, did refuse to allow parties concerned and interested to be present when the witnesses testified and then suggest questions to them by way of cross-examination, I think we should in this resolution direct that if any one of the members of the committee believes it is for the interest of truth and justice that the proceedings be open that they should be open. The Senator from Delaware has well stated the case. I can state my own experience. I served on a committee, and that committee was here, far away from the people whose acts as bodies, whose acts as individuals were challenged by witnesses brought here. That committee sat here with open doors, and I know that it was in the interest of truth and justice that it did so. This enabled me to have present persons having some knowledge of the matters investigated, and they could and did suggest to me information about the transaction spoken of which enabled me, when witnesses on the stand had given statements, to elicit facts on cross-examination that entirely changed the transaction that was under investigation from what it had appeared to be from the testimony given by these witnesses on their direct examination.

The committee go among strangers. If the doors are closed they have no one present while witnesses are testifying who can suggest facts, or questions to be put to the witnesses which may be very important to those who are charged with wrongful acts. I hope, for the sake of our American institutions and character, where there is an investigation which touches large communities, which touches the character of many individuals, that if one of the members of the committee deems it essential for getting at the truth to have the doors open it shall be permitted. It is unheard of in all our judicial investigations that the witnesses should be examined in secret. When parties are interested, when they are charged with misconduct, with what would affect their character if not their rights, it is their right to be present and hear the testimony and suggest questions to the gentleman who is examining the witness, and also that they know what has been testified. The accused may then be able to bring before the committee witnesses that will contradict the evidence which has been given and prove what is the truth.

I am in favor of having a full, fair, thorough investigation. I am one of those who, if it be proved that wrongs are perpetrated against the humblest citizen, will endeavor to prevent them by corrective legislation, if we can do it. But I wish the investigation to be open and fair, so that the people who are accused may have an opportunity to defend themselves against false charges. The power of this committee reaches all the States. It may be that there are transactions in Northern States to be investigated as to which I may have prejudices against those accused; but I do not know my own heart if I would not resist the proposition that a committee of my political friends should examine witnesses against these parties with closed doors, excluding them from hearing the testimony and cross-examining the witnesses against them. Inasmuch as there have been committees who thought it their right to sit with closed doors taking testimony against individuals and communities charged with offenses, I trust we will now disapprove that practice by at least declaring that if one of the Senators on this committee believes the doors should be open while witnesses are being examined, this shall be done. This will be but justice to those charged with misconduct and will give them an opportunity which they should have to cross-examine the witnesses who give testimony against them and to produce witnesses in their vindication if they are able to do so.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, two years ago I had quite a protracted experience in the taking of testimony by a subcommittee of the Senate, and I must say, judging from my experience as well as the reason of the thing, that I cannot conceive of a plan that could be devised for affording opportunities for perjury more thorough than for a committee to take testimony of this character with closed doors. The subcommittee of which I was a member sat with closed doors. We examined, I believe, between three and four hundred witnesses. My colleagues and myself were entire strangers in the community where we sat. The witnesses were brought, by persons who had more or less political influence in the investigation, from over a territory that embraced hundreds of miles. I do not doubt myself that many of the witnesses were prompted to tell the stories they did tell. Besides, I saw day after day the rankest injustice done scores of men who were utterly helpless to remedy the evil. A witness was very often ignorant, sometimes corrupt. We could not tell whether he was corrupt or not; there was nobody there to tell us. He would be sworn, and his statement was that Mr. John Smith had said so and so to him on one occasion for the purpose of intimidating him and depriving him of the right to vote; that he threatened to turn him off his place; that Mr. James Jones had said a like thing about him, and he had heard so and so, and many other things of an aggravating character were said to him. It is true that I, being on the committee, might send word to the man charged to come and exculpate himself, if he could, but that is an impossible task practically, for you are examining three or four hundred witnesses, and you have no reason to know whether the witness tells the truth or not; you do not know the character of the man he is talking about; he may be one of the best citizens of the State or some trifling person not worth considering. It is an inquisition that is horrible to my mind. It is true, in our country grand juries examine witnesses in the first instance with closed doors, and it is secret; but this is not like an inquisition before a grand jury. The grand jury hears witnesses. Everything that is delivered there is secret—not published afterward. Besides, if a man is accused, and there is a true bill found against him, the trial comes off in court, where he has a right to confront the witnesses, to hear what is sworn to, to produce testimony to exculpate himself. The witness who swears against him is there in the face of open day, and is cross-examined; but that is not the case before a subcommittee of investigation. A witness is introduced; he swears to a state of facts that criminate a good citizen. I speak as a member of the committee. I do not know anything about this witness; he may be a corrupt witness; he may be one utterly unworthy of credit, or he may be a man who has borne a good reputation, and yet he has committed willful perjury. I am not informed of the facts; I do not know how to cross-examine him, however familiar I might be with cross-examinations. I am not familiar with the facts, and there is nobody to instruct me. Perhaps the man accused is a hundred miles off; I do not know whether to send for him or not. It would put the Government to great expense to send a hundred miles for him; and perhaps when he is brought there he is a person not worthy attention. I maintain that this is wrong in principle, and I join in the sentiment expressed by the Senator from Delaware a moment ago, that this is against the principles of eternal justice, and it is disgraceful, in my judgment, to the American people.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from New York over the way [Mr. KERNAN] that the question now before the Senate is quite different from the question presented by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.] His proposition was to insert in this resolution a command to the committee that their doors should be wide open to everybody to take the possession of the room from the control of the committee absolutely, to give a member of the committee no more right to enter it than anybody else has, and therefore to clothe any mortal with the authority of your command to take possession of the room whenever he saw fit to do it.

Mr. BUTLER. My friend, the honorable Senator, does not desire to misrepresent me about that matter.

Mr. HOWE. I am not talking about the Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not say any such thing, sir.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly not.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not mean anything of the kind.

Mr. HOWE. I am only interpreting, not the Senator but his amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Ah!

Mr. HOWE. It was the effect of the amendment of which I was speaking. The proposition now before the Senate is to clothe the minority of the committee instead of the majority of the committee with this power to throw open the doors.

The Senator from New York says with a great deal of plausibility that it cannot be supposed that the Senate will put upon this committee any one man who for mischievous purposes would seek to open the doors of the committee-room. I cannot take issue with the Senator upon that statement; but I meet it with another, I think quite as plausible. If it cannot be supposed that the Senate would send one single man upon this inquiry who for mischievous purposes would open the doors of the committee-room, is it to be supposed that the Senate will send the majority of a committee who for mischievous purposes would close the doors of the committee-room? The question before the Senate is not whether this inquiry shall be made in secret or in public. It is whether you will intrust your committee with the power to determine when the doors may be closed and how far they may be closed, who may be present at the examination of witnesses, and who may be excluded; but to put a positive command upon the committee and not leave it to the discretion of the committee, as has been the case I believe always heretofore. It does by no manner of means follow that the investigation will be secret.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] said just now, and I think he spoke accurately, that there was no instance to be found in which such an obligation had been imposed by the act of the Senate upon a committee. It has been left, I understood him to say, uniformly within the discretion of the committee. I happen to have been a member of two committees charged by the Senate with rather important inquiries. One was referred to by the Senator from Delaware, an investigation into the affairs of the custom-house in New York. He stated correctly that it was left by the Senate to the committee to open or close the doors of the committee-room, and he stated correctly that in the exercise of that discretion the committee did open the doors and did not close them. Later than that I was a member of a committee charged by the Senate with conducting an investigation in the State of Louisiana. There the committee was left with full discretion as to whether the doors should be open or closed. The doors in fact were open throughout that investigation. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] remarked just now that it had already been proven that there was no hesitation on the part of republicans to give testimony in the State of Louisiana, that they were so willing to testify that they not only testified on one side but frequently, if I understood him, on both. I am not prepared to deny but there may have been many such witnesses found in Louisiana. Whether they testified freely on both sides, or having testified freely on one side were compelled to testify on the other, I do not know. I do not know to what cases the Senator alludes, but I feel bound to say here that I conversed with witnesses in the State of Louisiana, not with one, not with black witnesses, but with white witnesses, who protested that they dared not testify, and who made me believe that if they were placed upon the stand they would be called upon to decide for themselves whether they would tell the truth as they revealed it in secret and take the consequences that might follow upon telling the truth, or whether they would perjure themselves and take such penalties as might be imposed upon them.

I did refuse to compel one witness to testify—a white man, an educated man; he was a carpet-bagger, he came from the other side of the Atlantic. I refused to compel him to testify because he protested that he was afraid to testify, and because he made me believe he was afraid. I remember another witness, not a carpet-bagger, a native Louisianian, a man more than fifty years old, a lawyer by profession, a planter by occupation, whom I understood to be a man of worth. His testimony was believed to be important. If he would swear on the stand to what he told me I should consider it important. I refused to put him on the stand because of his protestations that he dared not go on the stand and repeat there under oath what he had told me. Perhaps it was because it was not true; that supposition is open to anybody. One witness did come upon the stand in Louisiana. He was a white man; he was a lawyer; he testified. I do not think any violence has been offered to him because of his testimony: I have reason to know that none has been. He was from a distant parish in the State. I saw a letter from his wife, addressed to him after his testimony was published, begging him, in terms very touching and very tender, not to come back to his home. He did go back, and no violence, so far as I know, was offered to him.

I understood the Senator from Delaware to say that although all the testimony, whether given in secret or in public, has been made public sooner or later, no instance has occurred where a breach of the peace followed the publication of any such testimony. One witness was examined before the committee of which I have just been speaking, sitting in the city of New Orleans. He was a colored man, not a very black man. He was certainly a very intelligent man, and, meaning no disparagement to anybody else in Louisiana, I really thought he testified with as much candor as any witness we examined there. That witness was killed, so the newspapers say, some months after his testimony was made public. Of course I do not know that he was killed in consequence or because of the testimony he gave. I do not know as a matter of fact that he was killed at all. I refer to James Law; but I do know that the papers say he was killed, and they attribute the cause of his death to the testimony he gave on that hearing.

Mr. President, if any Senator on the other side of the Chamber can point out what single sanction can be afforded to the testimony of any human being by the mere fact of its being given before all the world instead of being given before a committee authorized to contradict it and having all the world to draw upon for the means of contradiction; if they can show any possible security that the cause of justice or truth may have by imperatively demanding that every statement shall be made with all the world to listen, I shall hesitate before voting against the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia; but I have heard no such statement, and, thinking of it as carefully as I can, I can conceive of no such security.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I prefer the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina because I believe that in investigations of this kind the inquiry should be as open as it possibly can be. If the object is simply to procure an indictment against any community, against any individual or any number of persons, then an investigation with closed doors is the proper machinery whereby to secure the indictment. If, however, the purpose is to elicit truth that the committee may report to the Senate fact and not mere fiction, then every precaution should be made that the testimony which they take should be verity itself. As was said by my colleague, there is a principle involved in this question, a principle which is asserted even in the Constitution of the United States itself, that every man shall be confronted by the witnesses against him; that he shall have the privilege of being present and hearing what is alleged against him; but when you propose by an investigation of this kind to have an inquisition conducted in secret, you limit that principle which is involved in the Constitution. The character of individuals may be assailed, their motives may be impugned, their reputations ruined by witnesses who are testifying and making statements in secret that they would not testify to in the face of the world, because they know that they are secure from cross-questioning by any person who may have cognizance of the facts to which they testify.

In reference to the investigations in which I have been engaged, they have usually been conducted with open doors. I was upon the investigation to which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] has referred. Our investigations were with open doors, but I cannot say, like the Senator from Wisconsin, that I met with any witnesses there who were unwilling to testify openly and frankly before the committee. I know the fact to be that as many witnesses did appear as the committee could examine. They seemed anxious to testify, both colored men and white men; and apparently, so far as I could observe, they testified without the least apprehension of harm. It may have been, but it was strange to me to hear the Senator from Wisconsin say that they would not have been safe in giving their testimony publicly. No such witnesses approached me or said anything to me in reference to their apprehensions in case they testified. On the contrary, throughout the examination witnesses were constantly present; the committee, so far as I know, did not have to wait a single hour for witnesses; there were men present ready to testify on both sides of the question. I apprehend, if this investigation is conducted with open doors, the investigation itself will be more fair, and no witness will from apprehension or otherwise refuse to come before the committee and state all that he knows in reference to the matters under investigation.

Upon the general subject of the inquiry I have nothing to say. I have voted for the inquiry. I shall vote for the resolutions of the Senator from Maine, as I voted for the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio. I take this occasion to say that while the Senator from Maine says that there is great anxiety in the country, my impression is that the judgment of the people of this country is that such an investigation ought not to be had. Whatever others may think of it, while I vote for the resolutions, being willing that a committee should be raised which reflected upon the people of any section of the country, yet in my judgment the accusation ought never to have been made; and that in my opinion will be the judgment of the country before this investigation is closed. I voted for it, however, and I am ready to vote for it now. I am not sure if the Senator will further amend his resolutions to provide that this committee shall take with them the public Treasury of the country but what I might vote for them, because if there is a full and free investigation of all the subjects embraced in the resolutions I apprehend the labors of this committee will not close on the 4th of March, though the committee itself will be functus officio. Yet I say it would not close at that time if a full investigation were made, could a proper limitation be placed upon the expenses to be incurred by the investigation.

I hope the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia will prevail, so that if any member of the committee, whether he belongs to the minority side or the majority side, desires that the doors may be thrown open and the committee may sit before the whole world, then a single member of the committee may have the privilege of having the doors opened.

Mr. BLAINE. One word more. It has been said in this discussion, very prominently said by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] who is not now in his seat, that the party which prevailed in the recent southern election represented the property and the intelligence of the South. The idea when a committee is going South to investigate between these two parties, the one that represents, according to the Senator from Ohio, the ignorance, and the other the intelligence, the idea that those on the intelligent side will need the advantage in any shape in getting their testimony before the committee is a great stretch of the imagination. They have the advantage at the outset; they have all the channels of public opinion in the South; they have the representatives in both branches of Congress; they have the State governments; they have the press; they have the property; I admit it. They have a thousand opportunities to influence the judgment of a committee where those who have been wronged have one. In addition to this vast advantage you now ask that they shall have the additional advantage—I do not say that any Senator voting means that—but they shall have the additional advantage of what the country will understand is an intimidation of those who are weak and oppressed because they are ignorant.

Mr. KERNAN. In every case where there is a litigation between the humblest man and the wealthiest, there is no apprehension that the humble man will not have an opportunity of testifying. That is no reason, I think, for having a star-chamber examination. I did not understand the Senator from Ohio, who is not in his seat, to state just what the Senator from Maine does. He said that property and intelligence and education would have influence everywhere, as I understood him. I did not understand him to say that that had prevailed in this particular case.

Mr. BLAINE. I certainly do not desire to misrepresent the Senator from Ohio. I understood him to say that the result of the recent elections showed that property and intelligence had prevailed.

Mr. KERNAN. I did not so understand him.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from New York will pardon me; and I do not intend to say anything which will bring anger into the debate; but he is speaking from a point of view which does not attach to the case under investigation, in so far as the Southern States are concerned. For I think I am at liberty to say, without fear of successful contradiction, that a free election in the sense that Connecticut, which my honored democratic friend [Mr. EATON] represents, or New York, or Vermont enjoys never was known in the South. I take it before the war that there never was in that sense a free election. Let me illustrate. There was not a man in Virginia or Georgia or South Carolina who would have dared to go up and vote for Abraham Lincoln in 1860.

Mr. WITHERS. There were votes in Virginia cast for him.

Mr. BLAINE. Where? In what may be now called West Virginia, but not in the slave-holding section of Virginia.

Mr. WITHERS. In the slave-holding section of Virginia.

Mr. BLAINE. Who was it?

Mr. WITHERS. Of course I cannot give the names of the voters.

Mr. BLAINE. I should like to hear the history of such a man. I maintain, I assert it over again; you may find an example here and there, some man very heroic or very reckless who did it; but throughout the length and breadth of the slave-holding States there was no man who in 1844 would have dared to vote for James G. Birney. Do I exaggerate that?

Mr. WITHERS. That might be beyond my recollection; but I reassert the fact I stated just now.

Mr. BLAINE. When I allude to 1844 I am speaking of a period within the memory of men still living!

Mr. EATON. Perhaps no one there wanted to vote for James G. Birney. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. Possibly that may be, but from that time down there never was in the Southern States a free election in the sense that a free election has been understood in the North. There never has been a candidate put up for any office in the North within my knowledge, however odious to the majority of public opinion, who has not been as freely voted for as the most popular man at the hustings. When the Senator from New York tells me about the humblest man having his rights he is speaking of a polity that prevails elsewhere entirely different from that which has given rise to this investigation. I do not say that this condition of things was not a necessary outflow from the stand-point the South occupied. I do not say that in their estimate of the institution of slavery and the necessary surroundings of it they were not driven to it; I am not even debating that; I am stating that which is a fact, and I assert it again in conclusion, that within the meaning of a free election as Vermont or Minnesota understands it, there never was, prior to the war, a free election in any Southern State.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I do not know why the Senator from Maine should allude to me as occupying any position or affirming anything on the subject of whether elections have been free or not in the Southern States. I have said that he brings in these resolutions charging that elections have not been free. I have said that I should vote for the resolutions because I desired to correct any such evil if it existed. I am now, I have ever been and am, in favor of free, fair elections—elections not influenced by intimidation, not influenced by bribery or the corrupt use of money, not influenced by anything except arguments in favor of the one side or the other. I have said nothing about whether the elections were free or not. In this short session, while I was willing to have this investigation to ascertain what the facts are, I was opposed to discussing the question on its merits before the investigation was had and when the discussion must proceed on assumptions, and not evidence. What has this to do with what I said? In this country when any man is charged with anything that would deprive him of property or political rights or that would bring him into reproach, I said he should have an opportunity to appear before the tribunal when the witnesses who testified against him were examined, to the end that he might suggest questions on the cross-examination, for the purpose that he might know then, while the committee was sitting, what was the testimony against him, so that, if he truthfully could, he might bring witnesses to show that he was not guilty of the offense or wrongful acts sought to be proved against him.

That is all that I have urged or said; and I hope that I will ever stand up for this great right and safeguard, so important to the sifting out of the truth and to prevent falsehood and imposition, that the man charged with anything wrong might be present to hear what the witnesses against him said and have them cross-examined, and have called upon the stand such witnesses as he may wish to vindicate himself. That is all I spoke for, and there is no partisan politics in it. I was amazed to hear it said that this amendment raised a party political question. I do not propose to be drawn into any discussion of the question to be investigated by the committee before we get the evidence and learn what the truth is, but I want the committee to give every side a fair chance and have such evidence taken by the committee as will bring out the truth fairly and fully.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, the inquiry proposed here is one which does not affect individuals. The subject of this inquiry has been brought to the attention of the Congress of the United States and the people through a message of the Executive of the nation. It does not arise from a partisan stand-point. The President of the United States, charged with the execution of the duties of President in preserving the Constitution, has communicated to the United States through its Congress the fact that the Executive has been advised seriously and credibly that the Constitution of the United States has been violated in certain respects; that the provisions of the Constitution which were framed to secure to a portion of the citizens the right of suffrage in the last election which occurred in this country were seriously violated; that citizens have been deprived of the right of suffrage by violence, intimidation, and outrage; and the Senate of the United States is about to inquire into that question. If this abuse and violation has taken place, if there are communities in the South where citizens have been deprived of the right of suffrage through violence, through murder, through the attacks of the intelligent and property-holding portion of the community, then it would seem to be a natural consequence that the same element by the same means might prevent the very same individuals from attempting to protect their rights and to vindicate the Constitution by appearing before a committee of Congress to testify in regard to those very facts. The nature of the inquiry indicates that it should be free from any possible intimidation; that the witnesses called to testify in regard to the outrages which are alleged to have been committed should be withdrawn from the eyes of persons who would stand there and by a very expression, as I believe I have seen on the witness-stand, prevent witnesses from stating what they believed to be true. It has been my privilege to participate in some of the examinations referred to, and the statements made by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] the chairman of the committee in Louisiana, I can corroborate.

In attempting to enforce this rule you violate, as has already been shown, all the precedents. In addition you introduce a new innovation by conferring on the minority of the committee the power which belongs exclusively, under all circumstances in all assemblies or bodies where voting is done, to the majority. If the Senators on the other side of the Chamber are so anxious about the administration of justice they should be equally as careful about the rights of a majority. It seems to me that in permitting this committee to exercise its discretion in all these matters we are pursuing the right course. The committee will not do injustice. They will adopt that course which will secure the results for which they were appointed, that is, to ascertain the truth in regard to the charges which have been presented through the message of the President of the United States, and to which examination is invited by the resolutions of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, I did not intend to have anything to say in this stage of the debate, and I only rise now to address myself to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia. The Constitution of the United States, in the amended articles, article 6, has provided that—

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

It would be idle for me at this time of our history to say that that was a wise or necessary provision in the organic law of this country. Our forefathers, with some little claim to patriotism and wisdom, inserted it in the Constitution as one of the essential securities of freedom and good government. If that security was necessary to be placed in the Constitution of the United States for the protection of the humblest individual in this land, ought it not to be respected in a proceeding in the nature of an inquiry or prosecution intended by its authors to embrace at least one-third of the people of this great country, and, if I understand the resolutions of the Senator from Maine, that may lead to changes in our laws and perhaps in the Constitution of the country itself? One of the resolutions of the Senator from Maine is:

> Resolved, That the select committee be further instructed to inquire and report whether it is within the competency of Congress to provide by additional legislation for the more perfect security of the right of suffrage to citizens of the United States in all the States of this Union.

Mr. President, in the judgment of the Senator from Maine, or in the judgment of the country, can anything be more important than the rights of citizenship, which he charges have been violated; than the right of the citizen to suffrage, which he charges has been taken away? And I ask if an investigation intended to affect those great rights, designed and declared to lead to new legislation upon that greatest of all subjects, the rights of American citizenship, ought not to be conducted with the same prudence and the same forms and have around it the same safeguards of law that attend the prosecution of the humblest individual in this country for the most trifling offense against its criminal laws?

I shake hands with the Senator from Maine when he says that he intends that no anger shall enter this debate. If I thought that what I said would destroy or disturb the harmony of the country I would maintain a prudent and I hope patriotic silence to-day; but I trust the Senator from Maine will pardon me when I tell him that, although declaring these sentiments of peace, he did not use the most pacific argument when, at the very threshold of his last remarks here, he declared in the face of the history of the last hundred years that there never had been until since the war a free election in the Southern States. If I thought proper, Mr. President, I could take up that glove, and I think, feeble as I am, I could persuade any American patriot to retire from the proposition. I hope the day may be long distant when party or sectional faction shall induce any man to believe or to repeat the utterance that the history of one-half of this country for seventy years was a continued violation of the principles of free election. If I thought proper to retort, I might say it was a calumny upon our history. I shall say no such thing. I shall leave it to the considerate and patriotic reflection of the Senator from Maine to correct it at his leisure.

When all the world have uncovered their heads to bow in reverence to the freedom of elections instituted and practiced in this country by Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and their great compatriots of the Northern States, the Adamses and their compeers, it is too late for the Senator from Maine, in this discussion publicly to declare that there never has been a free election in a Southern State. He forgets how often the votes of the Southern States had been cast for great and good men of his own section.

But, sir, I must ask pardon of the Senate for alluding to that matter. I wish I could have found it in my heart not to say one word about it. The Senator from Maine knows that I do not say it in the spirit of crimination or recrimination, but I assure him that is not the way to secure peaceable relations in this country.

Mr. President, last Wednesday the Senator from Maine, who before that day had introduced his resolutions of investigation, made his speech upon them. Immediately after his argument, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] introduced his amendment, and very brief remarks were made upon this side of the Chamber; this morning the resolutions were again brought up by the Senator from Maine. A motion by a distinguished Senator on the democratic side of the Chamber to lay the resolutions on the table met with no response from his party friends of the Senate. Eminent as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] is, highly esteemed by his associates on our side of this body as he is, occupying a high party position with us, so desirous and so determined were democratic Senators that this investigation should be full and complete and early, that his proposition to lay the resolutions on the table received the smallest possible support—only three votes from his party associates.

We showed then, from the North and from the South, that we were willing that this investigation should proceed, and that we would put no impediments in its path. The Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] remembering the troubles of the country and what had happened in his own State before a former committee of investigation, offered his amendment to the effect that the proceedings of the committee should take place with open doors, and upon that proposition a debate sprang up. His amendment was lost by a tie vote of the Senate. A proposition almost substantially the same but in different form was renewed by the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.] Now let us see how it stands.

If I understood the Senator from Maine correctly in reply to the Senator from South Carolina that wrong might be done in consequence of this investigation being conducted with closed doors, the Senator from Maine asserted that both parties, in fact that all parties in this Chamber should be represented upon the committee and that the wishes and views of the minority would be of course respected; and I understood him also to say that when a witness was examined before the committee if in the judgment of any member of the committee it became necessary that other parties should be called to reply to what the witness had said it was in the power of the committee to call the other witnesses or the parties accused. I think I am right. The Senator assents to what I have said. Now, Mr. President, that being so, I appeal to the Senate and I appeal to the Senator from Maine if the opposition to this amendment is not—I mean it respectfully, but I mean it strongly—a mockery. What protection will the Senator from Maine throw around his timid witness if as soon as he makes a statement in secret committee a democratic Senator discloses the fact to the local democrats? Will the circumstance that the testimony was given in secret make it less obnoxious to those who, it is charged, will resent it? Is that protection to the witness? Upon your theory of intimidation you must admit one of two things: that you cannot protect your witness or you cannot permit his evidence to be divulged. If the statements of the witness are to be divulged, then you furnish him no protection; but you do this by your secret commission, you impair the right of cross-examination and all the opportunities for having the whole truth developed. The statements of the witness go out garbled, they go out second-handed, they go out at best but deformed reflections. Days or perhaps weeks pass before the absent party can be heard, the accusers have departed, and the examination breaks down and you never get the truth. Now, we say, "put on the light." As the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] has so often said in this Chamber with more than dramatic effect, "turn on the lights." The Senator from Maine has called for the light. In his speech of last Wednesday he invoked the light on these transactions that the country might know what was wrong and that the wrong might be corrected. Now, when we meet the Senator and say "turn on the lights," oh, no, says the Senator from Maine, put us in a dark chamber, cover us with curtains, draw the veils around us, lock the doors, shut out the light, the light will conceal the truth, the light will suppress the facts.

Mr. President, the Senator from Maine is wrong in that. I am too weak to express the sentiment. I wish I had greater power to present it—this light, this light of heaven, the first creation of the Almighty, this light of day in the face of men is the great protection of all; it is the enemy of fraud; it is the enemy of force; it is the enemy of corruption; it is the light of day that protects our homes, that protects our rights, that protects our courts of justice, that protects every man in this country. That light has been secured by the Constitution. Let it shine in this Chamber and in and through every act of the Government.

Mr. President, I do not intend at this time to say what I intend at a fit season to say in defense of the people of the South. I have sometimes attempted to do that; but I say this, when that evidence comes here let it come with no suspicion upon it; let it come as a ray from the sun; let it come so that there may be no doubt about its truth; let it come so that there may be no room for controversy in this Chamber or elsewhere; let it be so unaccompanied by deception or concealments, let it be so broad, so bright, so clear that my esteemed friend from Illinois on my right [Mr. OGLESBY] and my esteemed friend from Florida on my left [Mr. JONES] will both see it without doubts and without confusion. Unless it is clear, open, free, it can furnish no instruction to the Senate or the country. Do not let it come here clouded, shrouded in mystery with these exceptions to it.

I will say one other word, sir. I trust that it will not be necessary for the Senator from Maine, or any other Senator, to make an assault upon the Southern States. If they feel it to be their duty to do it I shall meet it as best I can. I shall endeavor to tell the truth about that people, and the truth will be their best defense; but I beg leave here once for all—I will not say it to the Senator from Maine, because I will not do him the injustice to say that it is in his heart, but I say to all that if there is any thought anywhere, any expectation anywhere that anything can be said in this Chamber, or in the other end of this Capitol, or elsewhere in this country, that will provoke the South to recrimination against the other sections of this country, the gentlemen are mistaken. I tell the country, speaking for my own State and in part for the South of which I am, that such is not our purpose.

Senators from the North, if you are to have war with us it shall be your fault, not ours. You know that a little over twelve months ago it was in the power of southern men—I will not say to have endangered this Government, I will not harbor or utter the thought; but it was in our power to have given this Administration intense trouble. I think the country has said we acted patriotically in the matter of the installation of the present President of the United States. We could have imperiled the credit of the nation. We could, if we had been disposed as we have been misrepresented, brought on revolution. We could have thrown impediment after impediment in the way of the healthy administration of this Government. We knew it, but we had no dream, no desire of doing it. We will never do it. We desire its peace. We love its Constitution, for our forefathers had a great part in making it. We love its honor, for we claim that we had a chief part in its illustration. We expect to deserve its blessings, for we intend to be patriotic and true to it. We desire no sectional aggrandizement to your injury. We have felt enough of sectional domination to hate it, to shun it; and if we had the power, which we know is impossible, we would not exercise it over you. It is a phantom that you have conjured up and that does not exist with us. All we desire is our rightful equality in the Government, to be let alone, to build up our ruined fortunes, to maintain our honor, and to do and to have justice. We do not menace your rights or the rights of any section or citizen.

But when you propose to investigate us, when you call up and impeach our States, when you indict our people, when you declare here, as the Senator from Minnesota does, that the rights of the colored people are denied, we meet you half way. We say "turn on the light," dispel the clouds, see it all in broad, open day. Will you deny us this?

Mr. President, this Government has had the power to maintain itself against adverse fortune. It has maintained itself with wonderful power and wonderful courage. God forbid that it should go out to mankind and go down the stream of time forever that in this the one hundred and second year of its independence the American Senate, representing the thirty-eight States of the Republic, has declared that the truth cannot be reached by an investigation in open day. I do not and will not believe it.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a paper from North Carolina, printed in Raleigh, the capital of the State, a paper devoted to the interests of the democratic party, a paper which does me the honor to publish some remarks I made the other day in the Senate and which accompanies their publication with some editorial comments. Without feeling the necessity of any elaboration of proof of the justice and propriety of all that I said the other day which the honorable Senator now calls in question, I will read from the leading democratic paper of his own State as vindicating the truth of what I spoke. I will not inflict on the Senate the whole of the editorial. Let one paragraph suffice:

The South will resist—

The paragraph I allude to begins—to the bitter end.

What the South is going to "resist to the bitter end" I do not exactly know, but perhaps the paragraph will show:

The South will resist to the bitter end. This is unquestionably a white man's country, and white men will unquestionably rule it. But for all that we do not intend that the negro race shall be deprived of the right of suffrage. It matters not how they exercise that right. We care little how the negro votes, or whether he votes at all, the State and the South will be democratic with or without his aid. But his right to vote must be maintained, for that right entitles North Carolina to three, and the South to thirty-five Congressmen. Our northern brethren took a stick to beat us with: it has passed into our hands, and we take infinite pleasure in breaking their heads with it.

[Laughter.]

That is the answer which I read to the honorable Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. RANSOM. I had read it before.

Mr. BLAINE. You had not read it to the Senate.

Mr. RANSOM. And I had read the rest of the article, the whole of that editorial.

Mr. BLAINE. That contains all that I said in regard to the South: that as to the negro's right to vote the promise will be held to the ear but broken to his hope; the right nominally to vote will be maintained because it gives the South thirty-five Representatives in Congress, but that with or without his aid those Representatives shall be democratic. Why, sir, this is not merely a question between white men and black men; it is not merely a question between democrats and republicans; it is a question in the South between the democratic party and any form of opposition that chooses to resist it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. One moment. I have on my desk—I was trying to find it but did not at the moment—a letter published by Reuben Davis, of Mississippi, known to all gentlemen who are familiar with the history of the epoch about the opening of the rebellion as a very extreme southern man, a man who was in a persecuting spirit of mind toward everything North. He was among those that stoned the prophets. There was no man who went so far and staid so long in bitterness on this question as he; and yet he publishes over his own signature that when he attempted to run as an independent candidate against the democratic organization in Mississippi at the late election he was hooted and not permitted even to address the public; not pretending to run as a republican, but running as an independent greenback candidate, and they would not permit him to be heard. Why, Mr. President, we had greenback candidates down in Maine [laughter] and we had greenback voters there uncomfortably numerous about election time; but during that whole canvass and during the election it never once occurred to the republican mind of Maine that it would be a good thing to hoot those gentlemen from the stage and not permit them to speak. That would have been a queer experiment for anybody in Maine to have attempted.

And now, sir, if the Senator from South Carolina insists that I am making an indictment, let me say to him that I am indicting the democratic party eo nomine; I am indicting it as absolutely the foe of free speech in the South; I am indicting it as absolutely the foe of free suffrage in the South; I am indicting it as the life-long adversary of free election in the South.

The Senator from Ohio the other day spoke of that people as being "almost defenseless." They are here, sir, in this Chamber with sixteen States which in the next Senate they will have solid with two only scattering, with coadjutors from the North that give them an absolute majority of eight or ten in this body, and they hold the other branch of Congress by a grip just as strong, meting out law to us, voting bills up or voting them down just as they please; and yet the Senator from Ohio talks about me alluding to a people "almost defenseless." Nor will the Senator from North Carolina—I beg his attention upon that point, for I have heard it several times—nor will he I say take credit for the forbearance of the South or the forbearance of the North in its democratic party for not having a commotion at the last presidential election. I have heard that a great deal. I have heard it said here and there and everywhere that we owed a great deal to the forbearance of southern men, because we did not have a revolution about the time the question was up whether Mr. Hayes or Mr. Tilden should be placed in the executive chair. Ah, Mr. President, that is a fearful mistake for the Senator from North Carolina or any other gentleman to make. Behind the Congress of the United States if they had not done their duty, and over them, and destroying them if they had done other than their duty, were the same people that had expended life without stint and treasure beyond count that the Union might be preserved. And do you suppose that for the fate or the fortune of a thousand Mr. Hayeses or a thousand Mr. Tildens—and I speak with no disrespect of either—this people would have gone to war, or that you or any other section could have precipitated a war? No, no. Sir, > Lay not that flattering unction to your soul.

Say simply that as men and as patriots you did as we did what was becoming in the premises and that doing your duty as we did ours the meed of reward shall be its recognition—and no boast made of it by any of us.

Mr. RANSOM. Yes, Mr. President, and when we declare that we did our duty and when the Senator from Maine says and knows we did it, still in the face of that fact the Senator tells the world here today that we deny their rights to our own fellow-citizens, that we are untrue to the Constitution and our obligations, and by his last appeal to me, to which he demanded my attention, more than intimated that when we did that duty we were moved by fear and not by patriotism.

Mr. BLAINE. Not at all, not in the remotest degree. I intimated that you simply did your duty.

Mr. RANSOM. I am glad that I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. BLAINE. You did your duty, nothing else.

Mr. RANSOM. I am glad the Senator made no such imputation. I shall take his statement. That is all.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know what the Senator made out of it. I said nothing about fear; but if the gentleman wants to talk of fear, I tell him that if either he——

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. Wait. I tell him that if either he or I or any other Senator on this floor should fail to do our duty as becomes the representative of so great a people we should both be smitten with the withering condemnation of the constituency that knows how to enforce duty. That is what I say here.

Mr. RANSOM. I might say, Mr. President, that I hope I would be smitten with no such withering blight. I trust the Senator from Maine may not be. But, sir, I did not boast of what we did here in 1877. I submit it to the Senator from Maine if it was quite right in him, after the statement that I had just made on this floor that I did not intend to be goaded, or provoked, or irritated, or driven into anything like sectional crimination, to speak of courage or fear?

Mr. BLAINE. I had no intention——

Mr. RANSOM. I submit it to the Senator if it was quite right for him to speak of fear?

Mr. BLAINE. Why the Senator is drawing on his imagination. I made no such reference whatever.

Mr. RANSOM. I ask the Senator's pardon then. I may be a little particular about those things. I thought that was the drift of his remarks; but the Senator has asked what I made of it. I hope that I have made nothing of it. I hope that neither of us has made anything of it except something for the good of this country, something for its peace, something for its honor, something for the friendly relations of all of us and the common good of the country. Sir, I should despise myself in standing here with the robes of a Senator of a great State around me if I could think of a petty personal triumph in a colloquy on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. The question we are debating, Mr. President, is whether the Senate will direct that one member of this committee shall open its doors when every other member may think it prudent and wise and proper to keep them shut; and the Senator from North Carolina, while he was debating that particular portion of the case, spoke as though we were sending a committee down South to indict somebody. There is no particular individual from the Potomac to the Rio Grande that is aimed at by the resolutions. We are going down to indict no man and to try no man. It is to ascertain a question far beyond and far above the rights or the wrongs of any individual; and that is whether there is a fair and impartial representation in the make-up of the Congress of the United States; and in this connection I beg here to reply to a remark made by the honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] on the day when these resolutions were debated before, and that remark implied that even if there might be some advantage for the South in the popular branch of Congress it was an advantage more than compensated by some countervailing advantage which we held in this branch. Sir, whenever that phase is brought to light, knowing that it is held up as a dreadful example, let me tell the honorable Senator from Mississippi and the country that I can name six Southern States that send twelve Senators to this floor with one-half the white population of the six New England States and with less than the aggregate population. So that if the remedy hinted at by the Senator from Mississippi should be resorted to, that scalpel would cut more deeply into the South than it would into the North. Let me tell him, sir, that of the thirty-two Senators who sit here from the Southern States and forty-four from the Northern States, a much larger number of constituents are behind each northern Senator than behind each southern Senator. Then if you take it in classes between the North and South the advantage is overwhelmingly against the South. If you take the frightful example of New England, always held up, I will gather together six States of the South that illustrate in a far more striking manner what the Senator intimated by the injustice of representation in this branch.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine misunderstood the position which I took with reference to the representation of States in this Senate, owing entirely no doubt to the want of clearness in my own statement. If I did not misapprehend the Senator from Maine on that occasion his argument was that under the amendments which conferred freedom and citizenship and suffrage upon the black race, the South through certain irregular methods had obtained a representation in the House of Representatives disproportioned, not to her population, but to the actual voters at the polls; and if I did not mistake him he quoted from the Supreme Court reports of the United States a decision that the power of Congress did not extend far enough to remedy that disproportion of representation in the other House. If I understood him he said that that decision which denied the power of Congress to legislate so long as the laws of a State itself did not deny or abridge any of these rights to the negro population—that Congress was powerless to intervene—was indorsed by him as being true to the letter of the Constitution which killeth. I understood him to say that the Constitution as thus construed was a killing Constitution, and that the letter of it stood up as a barrier to the enforcement of the rights conferred upon the colored citizens.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. LAMAR. Owing to my own obtuseness, no doubt.

Mr. BLAINE. Such might be the ruling of the courts, I said, on the letter which killeth, but I protested against the equity and justice of it. I did not at all admit that that was what in my judgment the Constitution was designed to be.

Mr. LAMAR. Precisely. He did not admit that it was what it was designed to be; but do I understand now the Senator to say that he differs with the court in its construction of the Constitution?

Mr. BLAINE. I do. That may not be a very great shock to the court; but nevertheless I do.

Mr. LAMAR. I differ from the Senator. The court will be greatly shocked, but perhaps will survive the attack. [Laughter.] Then, sir, I thought that it was not amiss to suggest that if there were remedies in the American people to prevent this disproportionate representation, and if we could so legislate as to make, not population but actual voters at the polls to be the limit of the representation of a State; and if Congress or the people by their amending power should thus interpose to reform the Government and to make it a government based entirely upon numbers, not that New England alone, but that the South also might apprehend that you would go further and crumble into ruin our entire system. Sir, when the gentleman tells me that the South is in the same danger that the East is, that the New England States are, he only reiterates a fact that I have attempted to impress upon both sections; and that is that the inviolability of the Constitution is the only shield and safeguard of New England as well as of the South.

Sir, the menace does not come from the weak and impotent South. When this popular movement, this effort to bring this Government to the pure principle of democratic absolutism, trampling down in its relentless strides the barriers of the Constitution, he will find the power not in the South, but in the mighty West, whose little finger is greater and more potent than the two thighs of South and East united.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.]

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GROVER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MATTHEWS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] who is absent.

Mr. MAXEY, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. SPENCER.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. CONOVER.] If he were here, I should vote "yea;" I do not know how he would vote.

The call of the roll was concluded.

Mr. BUTLER, (who had voted in the affirmative.) I forgot again my pair with the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT.] I withdraw my vote.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Some time ago I had business in the other House and paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] on this question. I wish to know whether he has been in and voted?

Mr. EATON. I voted, as I saw my friend in his seat.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. All right.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 16, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ACKLEN] states that Hon. Chauncey J. Filley, president of the United States Board of Trade, Hon. Ellwood E. Thorne, chairman, and Uriah Welch, esq., W. H. C. Price, and A. B. Minear, members of the executive committee, are now in Washington, and asks that the privilege of the floor be accorded to them for to-day only, as was granted to the officers of the National Board of Trade on Saturday last.

IMPROVEMENT OF SNAKE RIVER.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of the delegates of the constitutional convention for the State of Washington for the improvement of Snake River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD. It is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the delegates to the constitutional convention for the State of Washington, respectfully represent: That the vast country drained by Snake River, embracing about ten thousand square miles of rich agricultural and the same amount of valuable timber lands, is rapidly filling up with an industrious and enterprising population, whose settlement was mainly induced by the belief that the Northern Pacific Railroad would be carried to an early completion, and thus afford them means of communication with other parts of the Union; that the failure of the company to construct said road has left them no channel save that afforded by said river through which they can obtain speedy protection from the attacks of the numerous Indian tribes to which they are exposed, or carry on a commerce with the world; that said river is the best and most direct natural highway across one-half of the continent, and in consideration of the present and prospective importance of its commerce, its rapidly increasing population, and the necessities of the people already settled in its valley, of national character and importance.

Your memorialists further represent: That said river during the low stage of water annually occurring in or about the month of August is closed to navigation until the recurrence of high water in the spring, by reason of which they are cut off from all intercourse with the settled portions of the country save by wagon-roads and pack-trails; that by the removal of certain obstructions from its channel, said river can be rendered navigable from its mouth to Lewiston, a distance of about one hundred and fifty miles, up to the time when the navigation of the upper Columbia is discontinued, which is usually in the month of December. For detailed information concerning the nature and extent of these obstructions your memorialists respectfully refer to the annual report of Colonel John M. Wilson, chief of engineers, for 1877, Appendix JJ, page 1039, and following, a copy of which is submitted herewith.

If a sufficient sum is made available at one time, it is believed this improvement can be completed during a single season, and at a great saving to the Government, as a very large percentage of the small appropriations heretofore set apart for the work has necessarily been exhausted in preparations which are nearly, if not quite, as extensive on each occasion as they would be if it were carried on from its commencement to final completion.

Believing that the object is one of great and pressing necessity and of national importance, we respectfully ask that the sum of $100,000 be appropriated for the improvement of Snake River, from its mouth to Lewiston, in the Territory of Idaho—that being the amount estimated by competent engineers to be necessary for the purpose. And your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

TAX ON TOBACCO.

Mr. AIKEN, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial from the National Grange, asking for a repeal or a reduction of the tax on tobacco; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD. It is as follows:

To the honorable Senators and members of the House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

At the twelfth annual session of the National Grange, held in November last in Richmond, Virginia, and composed of representatives from twenty-seven States of this Union, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That this National Grange direct that a respectful but earnest memorial be prepared by the executive committee of the National Grange, and that the same be presented to the Congress of the United States, praying for the repeal of the unjust law levying this onerous and partial tax, or at least a reduction of the same."

Pursuant to this resolution your memorialists respectfully present the following reasons that induce them to urge the reduction, if not the repeal, of the existing tax upon one of our most valuable agricultural staples—tobacco:

First. Never before in the history of our Government has any great agricultural staple been selected to endure such an undue proportion of our national burdens, amounting now annually to more than $40,000,000, and aggregating since the war over $400,000,000.

Second. When this tax was originally imposed upon tobacco, as upon cotton, it was justified upon the ground that it was a war measure, to be removed, as was that upon cotton, as soon after the close of the war as practicable.

Third. The existing tax of twenty-four cents per pound, which is near 400 per cent. upon the value of the planter's leaf-tobacco, is more onerous and oppressive to both producer and consumer to-day than it has ever been before, from the general depression of the trade and the universal shrinkage of values of the country.

Fourth. In France the tobacco trade is a governmental monopoly; in England it is a penal offense to grow the plant; in free America it does not comport with the genius of our Government to oppress its products with onerous taxation.

Fifth. The annual reduction in the price of tobacco, until the medium and lower grades are placed upon the market at less than the cost of production, is evidence that it is not the consumer alone who pays the tax.

Sixth. The excessive tax offers a bounty for growing leaf-tobacco in States where tobacco is not a staple, in small patches for home consumption.

Seventh. To levy a tax upon the staple product of any portion of our country is relieving the other portions from their just share of the burdens of a common Government.

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire and report to the House at the earliest period practicable—

First. Whether there is, or ever has been, any law authorizing the creation and maintenance of what is known as the "secret service division of the Treasury Department."

Second. The time and occasion which originated said organization, and by what authority and for what purpose it has been kept up and maintained.

Third. The names of the persons composing that organization; for what purposes employed, and how paid; and also in what manner the various sums heretofore appropriated by Congress for that purpose have been expended by said secret service division; and whether any accountability is or has been imposed on said organization, or the members composing it, for the moneys appropriated to the use of said secret service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this resolution?

Mr. HALE. Let it be referred.

Mr. FINLEY. Very well; let it go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PENSIONS FOR WAR OF 1812.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to introduce for present consideration a joint resolution which I send to the desk. I gave notice on Friday last that I would do so. I think the measure is so manifestly just and right that every member on the floor will vote for it.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas, anticipating war with Great Britain, the Government of the United States received into its military and naval service persons who were discharged from such service less than fourteen days subsequent to June 18, 1812, the date of the formal declaration of war; and

Whereas, owing to the imperfect means of communication which existed at the date of the President's proclamation that peace had been established (February 18, 1815) between the United States and Great Britain, many persons who were received into the military and naval service of the United States to serve in the war of 1812 were retained in such service a considerable time after the establishment of peace: Now,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in the settlement of claims for pension and bounty lands on account of service in the war of 1812 the Commissioner of Pensions shall compute all the time the soldier served between June 1, 1812, and March 1, 1815.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering at this time the joint resolution which has just been read?

Mr. MACKEY. I object until it has been considered by the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

Mr. WILSON. This joint resolution has been examined by the Commissioner of Pensions, and he declares it to be eminently just and proper.

Mr. MACKEY. What objection is there to a reference?

Mr. WILSON. The objection is, that if it is referred it will never get back here again. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. MACKEY. I cannot do so.

Mr. WILSON. Then I will withdraw the joint resolution.

BUREAU OF MILITARY JUSTICE.

GOVERNMENT MONEY IN NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration and adoption at this time the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House, at the earliest day practicable after the close of the congressional recess, whether there were any balances in coin standing to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States in any national bank on the 1st day of March, 1876, and on the first of each succeeding month to and including the 1st of January, 1879, and the names and location of the banks which held such balances and the amount held by each at the respective dates indicated.

There being no objection, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] yield for that purpose?

Mr. CHALMERS. I cannot yield for that purpose, and do not yield further for any purpose, and call for the regular order.

CORRUPTION IN ELECTIONS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] coming over from Monday last, to suspend the rules and pass the bill, which the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That no officer, agent, or contractor, or other person holding any office or employment of profit or trust under the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, shall, by the contribution of money or other valuable thing, or by the use or abuse of any official privilege or function, or by threat and menaces, or in any other manner, intermeddle with the election of any member or members of either House of Congress or of the President or Vice-President of the United States of America; and every such officer or other person offending therein shall be held guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall be removed from such office or employment and fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000; and that all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That any person who shall, by solicitation or otherwise, attempt to induce any officer or person holding an employment of profit or trust under the United States to contribute money or any valuable thing, to be used for election purposes in any election enumerated in this act, shall be held guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon suspending the rules and passing the bill which has just been read.

Mr. SAPP. I am paired on all political questions with the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. SMITH. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am requested to say that the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. THORNBURGH, is detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. STONE, of Iowa. I am paired with the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. COOK, who is absent on account of sickness. If he were present, he would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

Mr. DWIGHT. I am paired with the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. MULDROW. If he were here, I would vote "no."

Mr. DEERING. I desire to announce that the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. BANKS, is paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. BLAND. I do not know how Mr. BANKS would vote.

Mr. McGOWAN. My colleague, Mr. KEIGHTLEY, is paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. TURNER. If Mr. KEIGHTLEY were here, he would vote "no."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

TRANSPORTATION OF MAILS BY RAILROAD.

Mr. BLOUNT, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5682) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for transportation of mails by railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BLOUNT. I give notice that I shall call up this bill to-morrow morning.

Mr. GARFIELD. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, his secretary; who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1625) granting a pension to Abram V. Miller, late a lieutenant in Company E, of the One hundred and eighty-fourth regiment, Pennsylvania Volunteers; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5307) to correct an error of enrollment in a bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HUMPHREY] is next entitled to the floor for a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I did not expect that my name would be reached to-day, and I am not prepared to submit a motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] on the other side of the House is next on the list.

Mr. RYAN. If the gentleman on this side who is now entitled to make a motion to suspend the rules is not ready, would it not be proper to accord the floor to another gentleman on this side, instead of going to the other side?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not; the Chair has departed from the list of last year in order to give each side of the House alternately an opportunity for these motions. If a gentleman on the other side should lose his right, the result would be the same.

AID TO ACTUAL SETTLERS ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. No. 110) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," approved May 20, 1862.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, which is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act, any person who is entitled to, and shall comply with, the provisions of the act to which this is supplemental, as well as all the requirements imposed by this act, shall receive from the Treasury of the United States, out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500 in a loan, to be repaid as hereinafter provided; which money so loaned shall be appropriated solely, by the person who shall receive the same, in improvements upon the land entered and settled upon, under the terms and conditions imposed by the said homestead law, including the erection of buildings, the purchase of seeds, implements of husbandry, and such necessary household articles and means of subsistence as may be necessary in the commencement of a permanent farming residence.

SEC. 2. Every person having thus complied shall, in addition, produce to the register or receiver of the land office of the United States convenient to the homestead selected satisfactory proof to the said register or receiver, by affidavit or otherwise, that he or she does not own goods or effects, money or other property, in excess of $300; that it is his or her intention bonafidely to settle upon and occupy the land entered and selected under the provisions of the said homestead law, and to make the same a permanent abode; that such person shall also make and subscribe an affidavit before the said register or receiver that the money so received under the provisions of this act shall be expended for no other purpose than that named in the first section of this act, which affidavit and all other evidence shall be filed and preserved in the land office of the United States where the proceedings are had.

SEC. 3. Whereupon the said register or receiver shall cause to be prepared a mortgage to the United States, to be duly executed by the applicant, conveying the land so selected and entered, and which he or she contemplates settling upon, conditioned for the payment of $500, with interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, as follows: $100, with the interest thereon, on the fifth year after the date of the mortgage, and $100, with its interest, yearly thereafter, till the whole sum shall be fully paid; when the said mortgage shall be satisfied by the said register or receiver, or by such person as may be designated for that purpose by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. A copy of each mortgage made in pursuance of this act shall, after the original has been duly recorded in the proper office for the recording of deeds most convenient to the land described therein, under the certificate and seal of the register of the land office where executed, be forwarded to the General Land Office at Washington, the original to be retained in the land office where executed. The said registers shall keep a journal of all loans, the names of the persons making them, their places of birth, and their respective ages. The said certified copies are hereby declared to be evidence on the part of the United States, and suits for foreclosure may be instituted upon them as effectually as upon the originals. The said several registers and receivers shall make monthly reports to the General Land Office of the United States of all acts done by them in the premises.

SEC. 4. Upon a full compliance of the terms and conditions hereinbefore stated, as well as those of the law to which this act is supplemental, by the person availing himself or herself of the benefits thereof, the receiver of the land office where the proceedings have taken place shall pay him or her $100, and $100 monthly thereafter till the said sum of $500 shall have been fully disbursed. But before the payment of any one installment of $100 subsequent to the first one, the said receiver shall be satisfied by other testimony than the oath of the applicant that he or she has expended the money loaned, and will expend the money received, in accordance with the true intent and meaning of this act. And if it shall appear that any money has not been so expended, no further payment in the particular case shall be made, and the mortgage given shall be forthwith foreclosed; and all rights and privileges under this act, and the one to which it is supplemental, shall become forfeited, and the title to the land entered shall revert to the United States. The several duties to be performed by the register and the receiver shall be generally under the direction and control of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and who shall also fix a schedule of fees for each officer in each separate case, but which shall not exceed $10 for them both. And the said Commissioner of the General Land Office, in conjunction with the Secretary of the Treasury, shall make and establish such rules and regulations as to the mode and manner of the transmission and payment of the money appropriated by this act as they may deem proper.

SEC. 5. No patent shall be issued under the act of May 20, 1862, and to which this act is supplemental, where a mortgage has been given under the terms of this act, until such mortgage has been fully paid.

SEC. 6. All such parts and clauses of the said act of May 20, 1862, which prohibit persons from the benefits of the same, "who have borne arms against the United States Government, or given aid and comfort to its enemies," are hereby repealed.

SEC. 7. Whenever the amount of the loan hereby created shall have reached the sum of $10,000,000, this act shall cease and determine, so far as the appropriation of money is concerned. And the certificate of the Secretary of the Treasury, that that sum has been applied as herein stated, shall be evidence of the same.

SEC. 8. All the several penalties imposed in the act to which this is supplemental for false swearing, and other offenses therein named, are herein incorporated and made a part of this act.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Before the reading of the foregoing bill had been concluded, the hour of two o'clock arrived, when

Mr. HUNTON said: I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the hour assigned for the consideration of business from the Committee for the District of Columbia has arrived.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] representing the Committee for the District of Columbia, claims the floor for business of that committee. The bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] will go over as unfinished business until Monday next.

Mr. WRIGHT. Or the first Monday on which the House is in session.

The SPEAKER. The first Monday on which the House may be in session. Technically, the resolution for the holiday recess is not yet operative, as it has not been concurred in by the Senate.

Mr. BURCHARD. Does this bill necessarily go over until next Monday? Suppose the District Committee should not occupy the whole of to-day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the District Committee would like to have the whole of the day.

RATE OF INTEREST ON DISTRICT BONDS.

Mr. HUNTON. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia [Mr. HENDEE] I am directed by the committee to report as a substitute for House bill No. 5471 a bill (H. R. No. 5683) to amend an act approved June 20, 1878, and to fix the rate of interest on bonds authorized by said act to be issued by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was read a first and second time. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the provision of the act making appropriation for sundry civil expenses, approved June 20, 1878, authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to issue bonds to redeem certain bonds of said District falling due January 1 and March 1, 1879, be, and the same is hereby, amended so that the last clause of the paragraph containing said provision shall read as follows: "Said bonds shall be registered or coupon bonds, and shall be of the denomination of one hundred or five hundred dollars or both, and shall be payable twenty years after date, and bearing a rate of interest not exceeding 6 per cent., and not to be sold for less than their par value, and to be awarded to the most favorable bidder or bidders after having been advertised by the Treasurer of the United States, as sinking-fund commissioner of said District, for ten successive insertions in two daily papers in Washington and two in New York, the bids to be opened in the presence of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the award to be subject to his approval."

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to advance to the sinking-fund commissioner, upon requisition of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, a sum not exceeding $281,500, to pay the bonds of said District falling due as aforesaid, and the amount so advanced shall be reimbursed to the United States from the sale of the bonds to be issued in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be authorized to expend a sum not exceeding $10,000 to defray the expenses of the reassessment of real property and taking the census in said District, as directed in the act of Congress approved April 3, 1878.

Mr. FINLEY. I make the point of order that that bill, under the rules, must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HUNTON. Unquestionably the bill is subject to the question of order if the gentleman from Ohio insists on it.

Mr. FINLEY. I do insist on the point of order.

Mr. HUNTON. I move, then, that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up and considering that bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. FINLEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. This day being set apart for the business of the District of Columbia, the first business in order before the committee is the bill (H. R. No. 5471) to amend an act approved June 20, 1878, to fix the rate of interest on bonds authorized by said act to be issued by the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HUNTON. The bill has already been read. Now, sir, the main object of this bill is to supply an accidental omission in the appropriation bill passed at the last session. In that bill, approved June 20, 1878, there was an effort made on the part of the committee to provide for some bonds of the District of Columbia which are to fall due on the 1st of January, 1879. It was provided that new bonds might be issued and sold, and the committee attempted and, I believe, did provide in that bill the rate of interest which these bonds should bear. By some accident in enrolling the bill, or otherwise, the rate of interest which the bonds were to bear was omitted. The main object is to supply that omission. The provision submitted by the Committee for the District of Columbia as contained in this bill is that the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue new bonds of the District of Columbia, for which the Federal Government will not be in any manner responsible, to take the place of the old bonds; and they are to be issued at a rate of interest not exceeding 6 per cent, and at a price not below par. The entire amount of bonds which will fall due on the 1st of January, 1879, in reference to which this provision will apply, is $281,000.

The bill has another object. It seems a provision was made by previous legislation for taking an assessment of property and a census of the population of this District, but so far no provision has been made for meeting the expenses of that assessment and that census. The pending bill appropriates a sum not exceeding $10,000 to pay the expense of that work. These are the two objects of the bill. If any gentleman desires further explanation I shall be glad to give it.

Mr. EDEN. I should like to ask whether there is any increase in the rate of interest?

Mr. HUNTON. The rate of interest on these new bonds is not to exceed 6 per cent.

Mr. EDEN. What was the interest on the old bonds?

Mr. HUNTON. Six per cent. I now ask by unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass as amended.

Mr. WRIGHT. The gentleman put his nose into my dish, when I wanted to pass the homestead bill, and therefore I must retaliate and object. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUNTON. Why does the gentleman object to this bill?

Mr. WRIGHT. Merely on the principle of retaliation. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUNTON. I move, then, that the question be put on the substitute to it.

The substitute was adopted.

Mr. HUNTON. I now move that the bill as amended be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

POTOMAC BRIDGE AT THE THREE SISTERS ISLANDS.

The CHAIRMAN. The next business before the committee is a bill (H. R. No. 942) to authorize the Secretary of War to construct a bridge across the Potomac River at or near the Three Sisters Islands.

The bill, which was read, in its first section provides that the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed across the Potomac River, at or near the Three Sisters Islands, near Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, a substantial iron and masonry bridge and causeway or approach; and the sum of $140,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the construction of said bridge: provided, that the said Secretary shall construct a bridge upon such plan as shall cost no more than the amount herein appropriated, and which cost shall include the construction of a substantial bridge over the canal, and any and all approaches to the said iron bridge; and no part of this appropriation shall be paid out of the Treasury until contracts shall have been entered into with responsible parties, and with good and sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of War, for the construction and completion of said bridge, including the masonry, iron-work, causeway, and approaches, at a cost not to exceed $140,000: and provided also, that the said bridge shall be so constructed as not to interfere with the usual navigation above the point of location as hereinbefore set forth.

The second section provides that the said bridge shall, in so far as this appropriation will permit, be constructed with a view to its future use for crossing purposes by such railroad or railroads as may desire to enter the District of Columbia upon it: provided, that said use shall be made under such restrictions and regulations as may be imposed by the Secretary of War: and provided further, that said railroad or railroads shall be charged with all repairs of said bridge.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. HUNTON. I am also instructed by the Committee for the District of Columbia to add to the first section the words which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the appropriation hereby made shall be governed by the provisions of the bill for the permanent government of the District of Columbia, approved June 11, 1878, for the building of bridges across the Potomac.

Mr. FORT. I should like to know whether the United States is to pay the entire cost of the construction of this bridge.

Mr. HENDEE. Half the expense is to be paid by the District and half by the Government.

Mr. HUNTON. If my friend had listened to the amendment just read by the Clerk he would see the expense is equally to be divided.

Mr. FORT. I was about to ask whether this bill provided the United States should pay all the cost of this bridge or whether the District of Columbia was to pay its proportion. The amendment provides that it shall be governed by the law which we have already passed adjusting the expenses between the District and the United States. Does that amendment cover the point which I suggest; that is, will half the expense of the bridge be borne by the District and half by the United States?

Mr. HUNTON. I beg leave to say more distinctly than I was able to state it when my friend asked the question that it was supposed by some in the Committee for the District of Columbia that this bill appropriating $140,000 for the purpose of building a bridge across the Potomac would of necessity come under the provisions of the general law establishing a permanent government for the District, and especially under that provision which says that the expense of the erection or repair of any bridge across the Potomac leading into the District of Columbia should be borne equally by the Government of the United States and the people of the District. But in order to make that more certain, my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BOUCK] introduced the amendment, which I handed to the Clerk, and which was reported to the committee, bringing this bill within the operation of that law, so as to make it certain that the people of this District should pay one-half of the expense and the Federal Government the other.

Mr. FORT. I desire to make one more inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia. This bridge, if I understand it, is to connect the State of Virginia with the District of Columbia. I would like to know of the gentleman if the committee considered the question as to whether the State of Virginia should not pay some portion of the expense of this bridge as it is unquestionably for the accommodation of the State of Virginia, from which this bridge leads, that it is constructed. It is clearly for the accommodation of the people of the State of Virginia that the bridge is constructed, and it occurs to me that they ought to contribute very largely to the cost of its construction. As the gentleman represents the committee here and also in part represents that State I should be glad to hear him enlighten the House on that question.

Mr. HUNTON. I am very glad to answer the question of the gentleman and any other question that may be propounded on this subject. All these questions were considered in committee-room, and the committee unanimously reported this bill as amended. There was no dissenting voice in the District Committee in regard to the propriety of this bill.

Now, as to the State of Virginia paying a portion of this expense, my friend from Illinois forgets the fact, I think, that the Potomac River is wholly and exclusively within the District of Columbia, and therefore Virginia would have no right to build the bridge if she were able to do it. And, besides that, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that all the bridges that span the Potomac, or the Eastern Branch of the Potomac, have been built by the Government of the United States exclusively except one; and they are all now, with that exception, free bridges built originally by the United States Government alone or purchased by the United States Government and now owned by the United States. I desire to call the attention of the committee to some of the acts upon the subject of bridges leading into the District of Columbia. An act was approved June 30, 1834, appropriating $130,000 for the repairs of the Long Bridge, and $20,000 additional for the payment of an outside claim connected with that bridge. The committee is aware that since that time this Long Bridge has been built by a railroad company, and is used by that railroad company.

Mr. FORT. Still I believe the Long Bridge is open to the free passage of the people of the District.

Mr. HUNTON. I know it is.

Mr. FORT. So that we have already a bridge leading across the Potomac between the State of Virginia and the District of Columbia.

Mr. HUNTON. Yes; but my friend from Illinois will understand that that bridge being used by a railroad company, in fact by two or three railroad companies, the constant passage of trains over it almost destroys its utility for bridge purposes; and between the two free bridges on the Potomac is a distance of eight miles.

Mr. FORT. Then I suggest to my friend from Virginia that he strike out the provision from this bill authorizing railroads to use this bridge, because about the time they would get it constructed railroads would come along and appropriate it, and soon it would be unfit for the public use, and the United States would have to construct another bridge across the Potomac.

Mr. HUNTON. The committee have unanimously decided to strike out the second section, so that that has already been done, and there is no provision in the bill, as amended by the committee, authorizing the use of this bridge by railroad companies.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia one question: if there is any probability that the amount appropriated by this bill will be sufficient to finish the bridge; or will we be called upon to appropriate more?

Mr. HUNTON. I am full-handed on that subject. We have an estimate of the engineers who stated, at the date of their estimates two or three years ago, that $140,000 would construct the bridge fully and completely. We all know such work is much cheaper now, so that $140,000 is quite ample.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HUNTON. I will hear it.

Mr. BUCKNER. Why is not the appropriation in this bill put in the general estimate of expenses of the District of Columbia as required by the act?

Mr. HUNTON. It is because this is a bill which the Committee for the District of Columbia decided last winter to report, and it was upon the Calendar.

Mr. BUCKNER, Mr. BAKER of Indiana, and Mr. BRIDGES rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUNTON. I am willing to answer all the questions that are addressed to me.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman can only hear one question at a time.

Mr. HUNTON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER.]

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I wish to inquire whether or not the committee have considered the constitutional question involved in the digging up of the soil and making the approaches to this bridge on the Virginia shore; whether it is necessary there should be an act by the Legislature of the sovereign State of Virginia to authorize it, or whether Congress can authorize the invasion of that State for that purpose.

Mr. HUNTON. I suppose if the State of Virginia does not object——

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I would inquire of the gentleman whether or not it is exactly right to assume that the State of Virginia might not object at some future time?

Mr. HUNTON. Well, if there is any doubt——

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Allow me to say to the gentleman that the question, it seems to me, ought to be investigated by the committee, and if it required the consent of the State of Virginia to authorize the people who shall undertake the construction of this bridge to enter upon her soil without becoming trespassers, if Virginia shall elect so to treat them at any time, provision should have been made to procure the assent in the first place of the Legislature of the State of Virginia if that is essential.

Mr. FORT. They may fence up that end of the bridge.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Add a proviso to the bill.

Mr. HUNTON. In answer to that question I desire to state that if there is any fear apprehended on that point, the Legislature of the State of Virginia is now in session, and a bill will be passed within a week authorizing this bridge.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. If the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] will be kind enough to give me an answer to the question which I first put I wish he would do so. My question is whether or not the committee for which he is now speaking has investigated that constitutional question.

Mr. HUNTON. They have not, so far as I know.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Well, it seems to me highly important, when there is to be an expenditure of so large a sum of money as $140,000 for a bridge, that the question should be determined whether or not the State of Virginia may hereafter direct the stopping of the approaches to that bridge, and the question whether we have the power by this bill to go there and build the bridge should have been settled.

Mr. HUNTON. The difficulty is one very easily met, if there is a difficulty; that is by offering an amendment to the bill, "with the assent of the State of Virginia."

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I am very sure of one thing, that if the committee of which the gentleman is now the representative had investigated that constitutional question and would say that there was no doubt about the power of Congress to authorize in invitum the abutment of this bridge on the soil of Virginia, I would take that answer as conclusive on the constitutional question. But if that is a matter in doubt, it seems to me that doubt ought to be resolved either by a recomittal of this bill and investigation of the question, or by making provision in the bill for obtaining the assent of the State of Virginia.

Mr. HUNTON. As I said a while ago, this bridge, if erected, will be entirely within the District of Columbia. It is possible, nay probable, that some of the causeways leading to the bridge may be in the State of Virginia. I think they will be.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. The entire approaches to that end of the bridge will be within the State of Virginia.

Mr. HUNTON. I presume so; and if the State of Virginia or anybody objects to the making of a causeway or approach to this bridge the assent of the State can be obtained within less than a week. I have no objection to an amendment which will meet that difficulty if the gentleman chooses to offer it.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to go on and conclude my remarks. In regard to the appropriations which have been made by Congress for the purpose of building bridges across the Potomac and across the Eastern Branch I desire to continue what I was upon when interrupted by these questions.

The Little Falls Bridge was made free by the act of Congress of March 3, 1853, and $30,000 was appropriated for the purpose. On the 20th of July, 1868, $26,000 was appropriated for repairs on that bridge. An act was passed June 30, 1872, appropriating $100,000 to erect an iron bridge upon the piers of the Chain Bridge, so called. An appropriation of $147,000 for repairing the Navy-Yard Bridge was made June 22, 1874. Therefore every bridge that leads into the District of Columbia, with one exception, has been either originally built by means of appropriations made by the Congress of the United States or has been purchased by the Government of the United States and made free.

The people who desire the construction of the bridge now under consideration are the only people trading with the District who are taxed by tolls on a bridge. I am informed by those people who have to pay a tax in the shape of tolls on this bridge across the aqueduct that the tolls they pay per annum when bringing their produce to the District of Columbia exceed the taxes which they have to pay on their real and personal estate. It results in a grievance to the people on the other side of the river as well as to the people of the District of Columbia.

In the progress of the effort made by these people to obtain a free bridge across the Potomac for their use, the question has arisen whether the present bridge could be made free, and efforts have been made in that direction without success. As I am informed, the bridge that charges these enormous tolls is a bridge built upon the piers of the aqueduct of the canal, where the canal crosses the Potomac River, and that the canal and the bridge are in the hands of lessees of the original owners, who are lessees for a term of years, and upon a failure to keep this canal in repair the rights of the lessees will be forfeited.

Thus it seems that the title to this bridge across the aqueduct cannot be obtained in fee-simple; and for this reason as well as others it has been determined that it would be unsafe to expend the money of the Government in the purchase of that bridge.

Another objection is that the lessees of the canal who own this bridge reserve the right to contract with railroad companies to run their cars across the bridge; and I believe I am correct in saying that there is now pending a suit brought by the lessees to recover damages from a railroad company for failure to run cars across the bridge according to contract.

An additional reason is that the lessees of the canal when asked how much would purchase the bridge from them replied that the price would be somewhere between $140,000 and $200,000; so that it would cost the Government more to take the bridge at that point, with this defect in the title, and make it a free bridge than to build a new bridge.

Now, we think that while all the other bridges connecting this District with the surrounding country can be used by the people free of charge, while it has been the policy of the Government to make all bridges leading to the District free and to open all toll-gates on roads within the District of Columbia, the people of this District and the surrounding country who now suffer by being obliged to pay these enormous tolls ought to be relieved.

I beg to state in addition that this bridge leads directly from the District of Columbia to Arlington, and you know, sir, and every gentleman of this committee knows that once a year immense crowds of people go from the District of Columbia to Arlington. We know, too, that the Government has forts on the other side of the river, especially Fort Whipple, where all the enlisted men of the Signal Corps are put for training and discipline. Thus the Government of the United States pays annually hundreds of dollars as toll in order to enjoy access for troops and supplies to these forts. We think that the people of the District of Columbia ought to have the privilege of visiting Arlington and the forts of the Government without paying tolls, just as they have the privilege of going in every other direction without the payment of any tolls whatever.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. As I understand the explanation of the gentleman from Virginia, the design of the amendment which he offered was that the Government of the United States should pay only one-half of the expense of constructing this bridge, the other half, under the provision of the act of last June, to be paid by the District of Columbia. Now, I observe in the concluding clause of the first section of this bill a provision that the Secretary "shall construct the bridge upon such a plan as shall cost no more than the amount herein appropriated, which cost shall include," &c. Now, by the provision making the appropriation the entire cost of the bridge is to be $140,000. I fancy that the provision added by the gentleman from Virginia will not meet the difficulty which I suggest, and that our appropriation should be only $70,000 instead of $140,000.

Mr. FORT. I suggest that the gentleman in charge of the bill consent to its recommitment, so that it may be put in proper form.

Mr. HUNTON. I do not think there is any difficulty about this point.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Why, sir, the bill contains a provision that the bridge shall not cost more than $140,000.

Mr. HENDEE. I had an amendment prepared to meet the very point which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has suggested. The bill apparently provides that the entire amount, $140,000, shall be taken from the Treasury of the United States. The amendment which the gentleman from Virginia has offered, providing that this matter shall come under the general law passed at the last session does not, it seems to me, distinctly or fully commit the District to the payment of one-half of the expense of this bridge. Hence, in lieu of the amendment which he has offered under the direction of the committee, I would propose the following:

That one-half of the sum which may be expended under this appropriation shall be credited to the United States upon the 50 per cent. which it is to pay of the expenses of the District of Columbia as provided in the act approved June 11, 1878, &c.

Mr. HUNTON. I have no sort of objection to that amendment.

Mr. HENDEE. The effect of this amendment is that the District of Columbia shall pay one-half of the expense and the United States the other half, which seems to me just.

Mr. HUNTON. The committee was unanimous in the opinion that the District should bear one-half of the expense and the Government of the United States the other half. I am willing the provision should be put in any shape that will best accomplish that object.

Mr. BUCKNER. It seems to me that after our legislation of last session providing a form of government for this District we are setting a very bad precedent by the present bill, which proposes to repudiate that legislation. The bill of last session provided:

The said commissioners shall submit to the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and annually thereafter, for his examination and approval, a statement showing in detail the work proposed to be undertaken by them during the fiscal year next ensuing, and the estimated cost thereof; also the cost of constructing, repairing, and maintaining all bridges authorized by law across the Potomac River within the District of Columbia, and also all other streams in said District.

Now, it seems to me that under this provision of the law the commissioners of the District should first send an estimate for this appropriation to the Secretary of the Treasury to be approved by him. I can see no necessity for any such legislation as this bill proposes. The gentleman's answer to my inquiry as to why an estimate had not been submitted in the form required by law is not sufficient. It seems that this bill was on the Calendar or had been submitted by the Committee for the District of Columbia before the act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia was passed; yet this is a work the expense of which should be divided equally between the District and the Government. It seems to me the case comes clearly within the terms of the act of last session, and that we are setting a very bad example in now repudiating the provisions of that act.

One of the objections made to that act was that the District of Columbia would come here with other appropriations, although the very object of that permanent form of government was to bind the District of Columbia to the payment of one-half of all these expenditures. For that reason I am not willing to vote for this bill, however important it may be. Let the commissioners first make their estimates, including this as well as everything else, and let provision also be made for levying a tax for paying the consequent expense.

Mr. REED. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that both the amendments proposed are open to the objection of ultimately leaving three-fourths of the expense to be paid by the United States, although that is not the intention of the parties moving those amendments. Inasmuch as the Government has already agreed to pay one-half of the expenses of the District, if the Government pay the whole of this bill and then is only credited with one half of the expenses, the effect will be to make the Government pay three-fourths of the bill instead of one-half, which is the intention of gentlemen. It would seem this bridge ought to be built by the District of Columbia, the United States under the general law paying one-half part of the expenses of the District of Columbia. I submit that to the gentlemen as a suggestion in furtherance of their evident design.

Mr. HUNTON. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont makes that so plain there can be no mistake about it.

Mr. REED. My point is this: that the Government of the United States pays the whole of this thing while it is only credited with one-half of it in adjusting the expenses of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask the Clerk to read the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That one-half of the sum which may be expended under this appropriation shall be credited to the United States on the 50 per cent. which it is to pay of the expenses of the District of Columbia, as provided in the act of June 11, 1878, entitled "An act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia."

Mr. HUNTON. I ask the gentleman from Maine if that does not cover his objection?

Mr. REED. It seems to me that it does not.

Mr. HUNTON. Then draw one to suit yourself.

Mr. REED. That I do not undertake to do. I leave it with the suggestion I make to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire now to answer the suggestion of my friend from Missouri. He objects there has been no estimate made by the District of Columbia commissioners. I beg leave to say to my friend the law did not authorize them to make any such estimate. I will call the attention of the committee to the language of the law:

The said commissioners shall submit to the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and annually thereafter, for his examination and approval, a statement showing in detail the work proposed to be undertaken by them during the fiscal year next ensuing and the estimated cost thereof.

It is not embraced there. I read further:

Also the cost of constructing—

I desire the attention of my friend especially to this provision:

Also the cost of constructing, repairing, and maintaining the bridges authorized by law across the Potomac River within the District of Columbia, and also all other streams in the District.

Now, until the bridge is authorized by law, these commissioners have no right to make the estimate; and the object of this bill is to authorize the construction of this bridge, because until it is authorized these commissioners have no more right over it than in reference to any other subject outside of their jurisdiction.

Mr. BUCKNER. You provide that they shall pay $70,000.

Mr. HUNTON. When they come to levy the tax to meet the expense they have to include one-half of the $140,000 under the provisions of the bill we have under consideration, if it should be passed. That is the way it is done.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to ask, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia that he will accept an amendment suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER,] which seems to me to reach the only material objection which can be raised to the bill as the committee have endeavored to present it to the House.

I thoroughly concur with the gentleman from Maine that it should be amended so as to make the cost of construction clearly divisible in equal parts between the District and the Government itself, and upon that point I take it there is no difference between us. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER,] raises a point that does seem to me to be a material objection, and I will ask the gentleman from Virginia to accept the amendment I send to the Clerk's desk; and when that is accepted, if it shall be determined the committee has failed to make itself clearly understood in its purpose of dividing the cost of this bridge between the District and the Government of the United States in equal parts, I trust the gentleman from Maine or some other gentleman will make that provision as explicit as language may serve.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That the execution of this act shall not be carried out until the Legislature of Virginia shall give its assent to the building of the abutments of the bridge on the territory of that State.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia accept what has now been read as part of his amendment?

Mr. HUNTON. I will say that I have just received a note from outside the Hall addressed to me since this question has been raised, and I will send it to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Gen. HUNTON:

The Legislature of Virginia did pass a joint resolution two years ago granting the right and requesting her members to secure the passage of this bill.

T. H. SYPHER.

I have a copy of the act and will hand it to you to-morrow.

Mr. HANNA. I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Virginia for a moment. I understand by the legislation of the last session it was agreed that the United States and the District of Columbia should share equally in the expenses of the District. Now, if the Government of the United States proposes to appropriate so much money to the building of this bridge—$140,000—and that that should go as a credit upon the one-half of the expenses of the United States, then the whole of the $140,000 should be applied as such credit. On no other basis can you carry out the letter and the spirit of the legislation of last session. To say one-half, would be depriving the Government of the United States of the half of the other half. You should therefore credit the whole $140,000, as that is taken out of the Treasury of the United States—you should credit that whole sum on account of so much money advanced by the Government of the United States to meet its one-half of the expenses.

Mr. HUNTON. Somebody's arithmetic in this matter is at fault. The design all around is that this bridge shall be built at the joint expense of the District of Columbia and the Federal Government.

That was the unanimous conclusion of the Committee for the District of Columbia, and it is the desire of every member of that committee on this floor to carry out that wish in good faith; and therefore the committee are perfectly willing, if the amendment which they propose does not express it in plain terms, that any gentleman shall express it in his own language. All we desire is that the bill shall be passed as the committee reported it; that this bridge shall be built at the joint equal expense of the Federal Government and the District. Now, I have an amendment here which it seems to me will put the matter in plainer language than any hitherto proposed. It would come in after the main provision of the first section, appropriating $140,000 to build the bridge, and just before the last proviso, and is as follows:

Provided, Fifty per cent. of the cost thereof shall be levied and collected upon the taxable property of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Would not this language be better?

Provided, Fifty per cent. shall be paid from taxes levied and collected.

Is it not better to provide for this payment out of taxes already collected rather than out of taxes to be collected in future?

Mr. HUNTON. I accept that amendment if the gentleman will offer it.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. My amendment would be as follows:

Provided, That one-half of said sum shall be paid out of the taxes levied and collected from the property of said District.

Mr. HUNTON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask whether that is not the provision under the operation of the law now? Does not the general law now regulate the pro rata shares of the District and the Federal Government?

Mr. HUNTON. In my opinion it unquestionably does: but there were some members of the committee who had doubts about it, and therefore it was agreed an amendment should be offered.

Mr. HENDEE. I wish to withdraw the amendment I have offered and to offer one which has been drawn up after consultation, and which meets the objection made by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. REED.] I think it covers the ground completely. The amendment that is now proposed is as follows:

Provided, That the sum which may be expended under this act shall be treated and regarded as a part of the general expenses of the District of Columbia, and the United States shall be credited with the amount which it may pay under this act for the erection of said bridge, upon its 50 per cent. of the expenses of the District of Columbia, as provided in the act of June 11, 1878, entitled "An act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia."

Mr. BOUCK. That is correct.

Mr. HUNTON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. What is the effect of that amendment?

Mr. HENDEE. To take one-half of the cost from the District and one-half from the United States.

Mr. FORT. Why does not the gentleman say so in his amendment—that the District of Columbia shall pay one-half and the United States the other half?

Mr. HENDEE. Because we have a general law providing that this shall be the proportion of expenses between the Federal Government and the District.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. HUNTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Virginia who reports this bill has urged members to vote for it, as I understand, because it will be a great advantage to the people of Virginia living on the other side of the river in their communication with the District.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. He did not say so at all.

Mr. HENDEE. The gentleman from Virginia did not say any such thing.

Mr. CONGER. I never before knew the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] to fail to answer for himself; but if he has got his lieutenants all around the House to reply for him, I hope he will commission them, so that we may know who are authorized to speak for him. I understood the gentleman to say that all those persons on the other side of the river who have business here, as well officers of the Government as private citizens, have to pay toll, and that those who bring their produce here have to pay more toll than their profits. I understood him to say also that the Legislature of Virginia is very anxious to have this bridge built, that they have already authorized the use of their territory for the construction of the piers, and that they have urged the Virginia members of Congress to vote for and sustain the passage of such a law.

I take it, then, that the State of Virginia, and especially that portion of it contiguous to the District of Columbia, has a great interest in the construction of this bridge for the use and benefit of its people; so much so as to call for legislative action from the Legislature of that State. Now this bill provides for the people of Virginia, or attempts to provide for them, a passage across the river into this District. It complies with the demand of the Legislature of Virginia by providing this bridge. But I notice that the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] in carrying out the instructions of his Legislature, and those who advocated this measure under these instructions, propose to throw the whole expense of building this bridge, which is built mainly for the benefit of the people of Virginia on the other side of the river, first on all the people of the United States and then on the District of Columbia.

The gentleman says the arithmetic is somewhat at fault. It occurs to me that the arithmetic of the gentleman is at fault in not asking Virginia to pay any portion of the expense of erecting this bridge for the benefit of its citizens. It does seem to me that an amendment should be made here providing that the State of Virginia should pay say one-quarter of the expense of this bridge, the people of the District one-quarter of the expense, and the people of the United States, who live too remote from it ever to derive any benefit from it, should pay not more than one-half of the expense of the bridge. That, it seems to me, would be a good arithmetical and equitable division of the expense.

And I wait now, having made this suggestion, trusting to the well-known ideas of justice and right of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] and knowing his willingness to carry out the views of the Legislature of Virginia to assist in building this bridge, to so amend this bill that that State may pay one-quarter of the expense, this tax-ridden District one-quarter, and the tax-ridden people of the United States only one-half of the expense.

Mr. HUNTON. I am not only always willing to respond to the commands of my State, but I am always ready to answer the questions of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.] I am aware that whenever a proposition comes before this House which is supposed to benefit Virginia it is not apt to receive the cordial support of the gentleman from Michigan. I recollect that not long since there was a proposition before this House to appropriate a half million of dollars which had to be raised by taxation upon the people of the United States, upon the State of Virginia as well as upon the other States of the Union, and all that half million of dollars was appropriated for the benefit of the State of Michigan.

Mr. SAYLER. I would ask the gentleman from Virginia how much internal-revenue tax that State pays every year? Is it not over seven or eight millions of dollars?

Mr. HUNTON. I was coming to that. Now when that bill appropriating a half million of dollars out of the common Treasury of the whole country, to which the State of Virginia in internal revenue alone contributes some six or eight millions of dollars a year, was under consideration in this House, I heard no word of complaint from the gentleman from Michigan. But when a little bridge is to be built over a river wholly within the District of Columbia, not one square yard of its waters within the jurisdiction of the State of Virginia, because perchance somebody in that old State is to be benefited by the erection of that bridge the gentleman from Michigan rises from his seat and calls upon the State of Virginia to pay a portion of the expense.

Now, I beg leave to call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan to the fact, that wherever a bridge exists leading from this District into any other State, (it can only be into one other State than Virginia, that of Maryland,) the people of Maryland are benefited as much as the people of Virginia will be benefited by the erection of this bridge. Yet the Government of the United States paid not only half of the expenses of those bridges, but every dollar of the expenses incurred in their erection or purchase.

Now, why there should be two rules adopted, one for territory in the one direction and another for territory in another direction, I can see no legitimate reason. I think in regard to the States that pay taxes into the common Treasury (and the State of Virginia pays alone this large sum for internal revenue) there ought to be no discrimination against any State.

I beg leave to call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan to another fact. I wish to know if he ever heard of a city that did not build bridges and erect railroads and do everything in its power in that regard to lead trade and travel into the city? And if it depended upon the people outside of the cities, having nothing to do with the jurisdiction of those cities, I ask the gentleman when those bridges and railroads would ever be made? The expenses fall upon those cities.

The Congress of the United States has already declared by general law that in regard to these expenses of the District of Columbia (and building bridges across the Potomac is expressly provided in that general law to be a portion of the expenses of the District) the cost shall be borne by the District of Columbia and by the Federal Government in equal proportion.

And I am not aware that the State of Virginia has ever instructed me on this subject. I am not aware that the State of Virginia has ever passed any resolution of instruction. The gentleman from Michigan is not aware of it. I was informed during the progress of this debate, and when objection was made that the construction of this bridge might invade the sovereignty of the State of Virginia, that the State of Virginia had yielded the question of its sovereignty so far as permission was concerned to erect this bridge or to construct causeways leading to the bridge upon her territory. But that Virginia has ever asked the passage of this bill, or instructed her Representatives in this House or her Senators in the other to vote for a bill of this sort, I am entirely ignorant. But I do believe that the State of Virginia has passed the resolution referred to in that note, and that the consent of the State for the erection of the causeway leading to this bridge has been given.

Now, while some gentlemen may think that the State of Virginia ought to bear a portion of the expense of constructing this bridge, I ask any gentleman to show me a case in the history of the legislation for this District upon the subject of bridges where any State coterminous to the District of Columbia has been called upon to pay a portion of the cost of the erection of one of these bridges. I know of no instance of that kind.

Mr. BRIDGES. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] whether any estimate of the cost of this bridge was submitted for the consideration of the committee before they reported this bill?

Mr. HUNTON. We had the estimate of the engineer of the Washington Aqueduct, stating that he had examined the subject carefully in the interest of the United States and that $140,000 would cover the entire expense. That was some two years ago; and we know that bridges can be built more cheaply now than then, so that $140,000 will be ample.

Mr. BRIDGES. As the gentleman admits that bridges can be built more cheaply now than at the time the estimate was made, I think the committee should have reduced the amount so as to accord with the present state of business.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the letter to which I referred and which was read at the desk be read again.

The CHAIRMAN. The paper is not now at the Clerk's desk; but it has been sent for.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, I do not know to what the gentleman from Virginia alluded when he said that this House had passed a bill making an appropriation of $500,000 for the State of Michigan. I do not know what that bill was.

Mr. HUNTON. The river and harbor bill.

Mr. CONGER. Ah, sir, this Congress passed no such separate appropriation. This Congress passed an appropriation bill embracing $6,000,000——

A MEMBER. Eight million dollars.

Mr. CONGER. Eight million dollars, distributed according to the judgment of the Committee on Commerce among all the States and Territories of this Union to promote the interests of all the people of the United States, without partiality and without favor, I suppose, (I do not know whether the gentleman is on that committee or not,) of which amount a large proportion, as in similar bills for years past, went to the State of Virginia.

Mr. HUNTON. A very small portion.

Mr. CONGER. A large proportion went to the improvement of the James River and a large proportion to the improvement of the Appomattox River, to make a river where there was none before; to make navigation where only the turtle swam in the earlier years of the Republic.

Mr. SAYLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask how much of the internal-revenue tax collected by the Government is paid by his State?

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman desires to ask a question which is entirely irrelevant to the matter now under dispute.

Mr. SAYLER. I think not.

Mr. CONGER. If we had to answer all questions about which the gentleman is ignorant or in doubt no further legislation could be carried on in this House. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYLER. I do not lack information, but I am asking the gentleman just now for a little information which he does not seem to be able to give me.

Mr. CONGER. The State of Michigan pays every farthing of internal revenue which the laws of the United States impose upon its people.

Mr. SAYLER. Will the gentleman state how much?

Mr. CONGER. There are no "moonshiners" there, and there are no men who follow the Ohio practice of smuggling away their whisky to escape taxation upon it.

Mr. SAYLER. I resent that imputation. Ohio has no such practice; and the gentleman knows that she has not. He must not make such a statement on the floor of this House. Now will he state how much revenue the State of Michigan pays?

Mr. CONGER. One hundred million dollars.

Mr. SAYLER. Internal revenue?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAYLER. Are you sure it is not more?

Mr. CONGER. If I had not been forced to make this statement, my modesty would have prevented me from boasting of my State. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I asked the acting chairman of the District Committee a very proper and pertinent question, founded upon his own statement, undenied and undisputed, which was that the building of this bridge was very desirable for the people of Virginia to enable them to bring their produce to market here and to pass back and forth between the capital and the surrounding country. Another statement of the gentleman was that the Government has its forts and its cemetery on the other side of the river. We admit the force of that fact as a reason why the Government should pay a part of the expense of building the bridge. He stated further that the people of the District of Columbia needed this bridge for purposes of travel and transportation, which was entirely correct; and therefore the District of Columbia should pay its portion of the expense. Now, I ask him whether the State of Virginia should not pay its proportion. He tells me in reply that Michigan has had appropriations. Thank God, Michigan from the beginning of its existence as a State has had in Congress representatives who were able to show that the interests of all the people of the United States, entirely apart from the local interests of Michigan, would be promoted by the improvement of that great chain of navigable waters on which Michigan borders in part, in common with many other of our northern and northwestern States. And all the people of the United States have received benefits, beyond all estimate, from those appropriations for the improvement of the harbors and rivers flowing into the great lakes.

But this Congress has given the same appropriation to all the rivers and all the harbors of the South just so soon as they would throw away their old hide-bound State-rights doctrine and permit this Government to help the people of the South. Sir, during the early years of this Republic southern statesmen held the views of my distinguished friend from Virginia, to the gentleman's left, and denied the right of the General Government to expend one cent within a State for internal improvements. But the time has come now when even the strict constructionist before me, the noted one of this Congress and the South, my friend from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] has yielded his assent to the doctrine of internal improvements by the General Government, and he comes before the Committee on Commerce with all the zeal and all the industry to get appropriations for his State that any man from Michigan ever had in going before that committee. He draws the mantle over his State-rights doctrines until the river and harbor bill has passed, and during the time of its pendency, and my friend from Virginia, and all my southern State-rights friends who oppose appropriations in theory for internal improvements, come modestly and humbly, but zealously, to the Committee on Commerce, as the chairman of that committee and all its members well know, and urge, notwithstanding their theoretical doctrine, notwithstanding their State-rights doctrine, urge that committee and urge Congress, laying aside their theory for the time being, to make those appropriations for the improvement of southern waters.

Now, sir, the country shares that burden alike and distributes it in raising its taxes. It is not raised by internal revenue alone.

Mr. SAYLER. One-half is raised by internal revenue.

Mr. CONGER. But by all the means of taxation, and it distributes it where in the judgment of Congress it is thought right and best.

For more than ten years I have heard my southern friends rise with an alacrity which seemed to indicate delight and inquire why Michigan, that far-off northern State, should have any portion at all, and complain of the river and harbor bill year after year. My friend from Virginia has originality enough generally, but he has fallen into the cry which you can find in every old Congressional Globe and every modern CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, complaining that Michigan has received some small share of the appropriations for rivers and harbors, and that the whole of these prairie States which have not a stream running through them or a drop of water to sail a boat have not received an equal appropriation. I ask my friend from Virginia whether it is right, in obedience to the resolution of the Legislature of Virginia, as contained in a note read at the Clerk's desk urging members of Congress to further this bill——

Mr. HUNTON. There was no such resolution, sir.

Mr. CONGER. Such was my understanding of the note read at the Clerk's desk. Is the note there? If so, let it be again read. If it is not as I have stated it, then I have misunderstood it.

Mr. SAYLER. As the gentleman generally does.

Mr. CONGER. Let the Clerk again read the note.

The note was again read.

Mr. CONGER. That is just what I said—that the Legislature of Virginia had passed a resolution asking or directing its members to vote for the passage of this bill. Yet the gentleman tells me I am mistaken. Shall I have it read again? [Laughter.]

Mr. HUNTON. Just as you choose about it.

Mr. CONGER. I do not need it myself.

Mr. HUNTON. I do not.

Mr. CONGER. If I am disputed again I must have it read again. If it be the duty of every member of Congress from Virginia to secure the erection of that bridge, and if it is advantageous, Virginia should pay one-quarter or one-eighth or one-sixteenth. Let the gentleman say whether it is just or right, and not bring in a resolution to tax the District of Columbia. Taxes here we are told (and I do not know how that is) are now beyond endurance. If it be necessary to bring in a bill to tax the people of the United States one-half of the whole of this $140,000, and there are dozens of men on that side who hardly ever rise to speak here but they din into our ears the burden of taxation on the people, I ask the gentleman whether it would be unjust to let the State of Virginia pay one-quarter or some portion of the cost of building this bridge in Virginia and save the District and people of the United States from additional tax?

Mr. HUNTON. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. CONGER. One word more and then the gentleman may answer me, as he has the floor. The Government has already built, as I understand, two bridges across the Potomac for the accommodation of the people of Virginia—the Chain Bridge, two or three miles above this one, and the Long Bridge below this point. Those are the only two bridges the Government has built across the Potomac. If the Government has already done all this, and perhaps a little more, and the sovereign State of Virginia wants communication with the capital, is it improper to ask the chairman of the committee whether there ought not to be a provision in the bill that the State benefited by this bridge equally with the District shall be assessed a little for it? That is the question I wish to have answered.

Mr. HUNTON. I respond to the question of the gentleman without the slightest difficulty. I say it would be eminently unjust to give an outlet from this District to Maryland free of charge and to charge Virginia for an outlet into that State. It would be unjust to make Virginia pay a portion of the expenses of this bridge to the same extent that it would have been unjust to have made the State of Michigan pay her proportion of the half million dollars appropriated to the State of Michigan one year ago. I have no difficulty upon that question at all, and I trust the gentleman is answered so far as that view of the question goes.

Mr. TUCKER. I certainly had no intention to take part in this debate. It is not my bill nor had I any particular interest in it except as it was advocated by my friend who sits behind me, [Mr. HUNTON.] As the gentleman from Michigan has on this occasion, as on a former occasion, with no unfriendliness of spirit I know, singled me out for a comment on what he deems my peculiar views on the much-disputed question of State-rights, I wish to say a word in regard to that. I do not think that this House will charge me with ever drawing back from the assertion of my convictions upon that or any other question. But the gentleman has stated that I was a warm advocate and a beggar almost before the Committee on Commerce in reference to the river and harbor bill. He is as much mistaken in that assertion as he is in his geographical knowledge as to the character of the Appomattox River. If the gentleman would come into Virginia sometimes as he has done and would take pains to learn a little more when he does come there, he would know that the city of Petersburgh is at the head of the waters of the Appomattox River, which is navigable up to that point, and that there is a tide in the Appomattox River even to the city of Petersburgh, a city which was celebrated enough during the four years of civil strife to have attracted the observation even of the gentleman from Michigan.

But not only was I not a warm advocate and beggar before the Committee on Commerce on the river and harbor bill, but I voted against it. The gentleman says my voice was not heard in reference to it. The gentleman ought to know it was upon a suspension of the rules that the bill was passed, and no debate has ever been allowed by that gentleman and the gentlemen who advocate such schemes as this of a half million to the little State of Michigan out of the public Treasury; no debate has ever been allowed by them on this floor as to the propriety of the passage of the river and harbor bill.

Now, I say the gentleman does not deny that he got a half million of dollars for the State of Michigan. And under what power was it? If under any power, it was under the power of the Congress of the United States to regulate commerce among the several States; and it is this power which, if the District of Columbia were now a part as it originally was of the State of Maryland, would justify the Congress of the United States in appropriating money for the erection of a bridge between two or more States. Now, when the Government owns the District of Columbia and the State of Virginia is another State, the question of how the bridge shall be built between the District of Columbia and the State of Virginia is for Congress to determine. Congress has exclusive legislation over the District of Columbia. The gentleman will find that in the Constitution if he will look at it.

Now, sir, I hold that this power to build this bridge across a river, that, as my friend from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] has stated, is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the General Government, and not at all within the jurisdiction of the State of Virginia—a bridge which gives communication, as the gentleman says, to a few of the people of Virginia into the District of Columbia, but which gives the people of the District communication away into the State of Virginia—authorizes Congress to determine whether it should not appropriate this money in order to give the intercourse with the District of Columbia. I shall vote for this bill, therefore, because I think it is within the power of Congress, exercising exclusive legislation within the District, to pass it. All that is asked is that the State of Virginia shall consent that the southern abutment of the bridge shall be permitted to rest upon the soil of old Virginia.

A remark was made by a distinguished gentleman who took part in this debate—and I thank him for it—which shows that the force of truth in the debates on this floor is not lost even on Indiana. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] two or three years ago, upon my first appearance in this Hall, asked me if I thought this was not a nation? I retort the question. The gentleman talks about not building the bridge, because Virginia has not consented to the abutment resting on her soil. He is very particular about State rights now, in connection with the passage of this bill appropriating $140,000 for the building of this bridge. I ask him if the nation has not power, under the authority to regulate commerce and to exercise exclusive legislation over the District of Columbia, to build this bridge and appropriate this money?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I think it unquestionably has that power, and I wanted to hear an expression of opinion from the gentleman from Virginia in the same direction.

Mr. TUCKER. Then the question of the gentleman from Indiana to my friend from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] was not a sincere one, in that he asked for a thing which was not a difficulty in his own mind, but merely wanted to poke a difficulty in the way of somebody else.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I wanted to hear a sincere expression of opinion from the gentleman from Virginia——

Mr. TUCKER. You have got mine.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Upon this question of State rights and the power of the nation.

Mr. TUCKER. We will not go into that question now; I have gone into it several times. I will send the gentleman an address of mine upon that subject, delivered in the northern region of this country; it was not done in a corner.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I would be very glad to have the gentleman give us an address here where I can listen to it.

Mr. TUCKER. Well it would take more than an hour, and under the hour rule I could not finish it.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. If the gentleman could not finish it in an hour I would try to get him consent to have the residue of it published.

Mr. TUCKER. I will do my whole duty on this matter. I will send the gentleman a copy of that address and I will ask him to read and inwardly digest it, for it will do him much good.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I have no doubt it will do good to——

Mr. TUCKER. To the "upright in heart" it will. But there is no necessity of disputing about that further.

I think it was well to put into this bill an amendment making the abutment of this bridge upon the soil of old Virginia to depend upon her consent. I believe in the eminent domain of the States and in the power of the United States to regulate commerce subject to that eminent domain.

Mr. HUNTON. I now call for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. TUCKER. I will just add one other word. I had occasion some years ago, in a case of a good deal of importance before the court of appeals of Maryland, to touch upon this question of the boundary between the two States.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TUCKER. I am on the floor, if you please.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. The other gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] a moment since called for a vote. If the gentleman from Virginia now addressing me [Mr. TUCKER] is on the floor, I certainly do not wish to take him off.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Virginia in charge of this bill [Mr. HUNTON] yielded for a moment to his colleague, [Mr. TUCKER.]

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, for a moment.

Mr. TUCKER. The question of that bridge between Maryland and Virginia arose a great many years ago, and it was discussed just before the war in an important case before the court of appeals of Maryland. I had occasion to take part in that argument, and thus became acquainted with the subject. In building a bridge at Shepardstown the State of Maryland, or rather the county of Washington, in the State of Maryland, built it exclusively. The only thing the State of Virginia did was, as provided by this amendment, to give its consent that the abutment of the bridge on the southern side should be permitted by that State, because the whole river was within the jurisdiction of the State of Maryland, and the right of the State of Maryland over the river opposite this District has been transferred to the Government by the cession of the District to the Government of the United States.

Mr. CONGER. And under that precedent, I think, you still justify the State of Virginia in refusing to pay any part of the expense of this bridge.

Mr. TUCKER. I do not say that.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I move to strike out the last word of the pending amendment. I think that my friends on this side of the House are entirely mistaken in supposing that the question of State rights is at all affected by the proposition now pending before the committee. I do not understand that the stanchest advocate of State rights supposes that there is any constitutional difficulty in the way of expending any amount of money by the General Government for the benefit of his State. [Laughter.] I have never found a strong State-rights man that ever hesitated to vote for anything that was going into his State; although as soon as an amendment was proposed applying perhaps to an adjoining State, and especially if it applied to a State further north, the old trouble of State rights immediately prevented that State-rights man from voting for it. [Renewed laughter.] But where it is for "our State," there is an abiding power in the Constitution that authorizes any appropriation of money that it is possible to conceive of. I say to my friends, do not think of hedging in a thorough State-rights man by any idea of State rights when money is coming home to "our State."

Having said this, I am free to say that I propose to vote for this bill. I do not vote for it on behalf of Virginia. Virginia ought to be able to take care of herself; if not, it is her own fault. I vote for this proposition to help our city, "our city," the nation's city.

Mr. TUCKER. One single word.

Mr. HENDEE. Will the gentleman from New York withdraw his amendment?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I will withdraw it.

Mr. HENDEE. I renew the amendment. In the Forty-third Congress I reported a bill like this. It came from the committee unanimously. I reported this bill, and I desire to say here that I left a sick-room this afternoon, which, perhaps, I ought not to have done, for the purpose of saying a word in favor of its passage.

I hope the gentlemen on this side of the House will not be misled by any discussion of the last year's river and harbor bill, because, in my judgment, it has very little to do with this bill. On the 3d of February, 1876, the Senate of the United States passed a resolution directing the engineer department of the United States Army to examine the bridge crossing the river from Georgetown to the Virginia shore. An examination was made, and the engineer who made the examination reported that bridge in strong terms as rotten in places and unsafe.

Now, in my judgment it is the duty of Congress not to be higgling here as to who shall pay the money for the building of a bridge, but to adopt measures to protect the life and property of the citizens of the United States and the property of the United States.

Some years ago the same complaint was made in regard to the bridge across the Eastern Branch; that is, that it was unsafe. A bill was offered to build a new one, and there were then found in Congress men fighting the construction of a bridge there, and they did it until there was a disaster which caused the destruction of property and nearly caused the destruction of life. Then they were willing to permit the building of a bridge across the Eastern Branch, and one was built.

Now, the only reasonably accessible bridge open to the people as a means of communication with the State of Virginia is said to be in a condition which has been pronounced by an engineer of the Engineer Corps to be entirely unsafe. Shall we erect across that river a safe bridge, and one that shall be free to the people of the country, more especially the people of this District, who are already heavily taxed and whose burden of taxation is unjustly increased by the enormous tolls upon the Georgetown bridge?

My friend from Michigan has referred to the Long Bridge. Sir, nobody ever passes over that bridge except, perhaps, with loaded teams. Why? Because upon one side is the railroad track and on the other the carriage-way; and these are so close together that no one dare drive across that bridge unless he has horses that are beyond any question as to their safety. It is scarcely safe for any one to pass over that bridge either day or night. Hence it becomes almost absolutely necessary that a new bridge be built for the benefit of the people of this District and of the whole country. Arlington is a place which is visited daily by hundreds of people; and on the 30th of May in each year it is not unusual to notice thousands upon thousands passing over that bridge for the purpose of decorating the graves of our dead soldiers. It seems to me almost criminal, in view of the report of the engineer as to the condition of the existing bridge, for us to wait one single day longer without passing a bill of this kind for the erection of a good and substantial bridge across that river at a point that shall best convene the public.

Now, as to the question who should pay for this bridge. In the act of last session establishing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia we provided that all expenses of this kind should be borne equally by the United States and the District, each paying 50 per cent. I do not think it necessary to go now into a discussion as to the righteousness of that proposition, because it was fully discussed last session and decided. I simply express the hope that this bill will be passed and that we may erect over that river a bridge worthy of this nation.

Mr. HUNTON. I call for a vote on the amendments.

The question being taken on the first amendment of the committee, to strike out the second section of the bill, it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next question is upon the proviso reported by the committee as an amendment. It will be read as now modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 1 the following:

Provided also, That the sum which may be expended under this act shall be treated and regarded as a part of the general expenses of the District; and the United States shall be credited with the amount which it may pay under this act for the erection of said bridge upon its own 50 per cent. of the expense of the District of Columbia, as provided in the act of June 11, 1878, entitled "An act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia:" Provided, however, That the execution of this act shall not be carried out until the Legislature of Virginia shall give its assent to the building of the abutments of the bridge upon the territory of that State.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the title of the next District bill upon the Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 3847) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to audit certain claims against the District and for funding the same.

Mr. MAYHAM. I am directed by the Committee for the District of Columbia to call up House bill No. 4810, to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill which the Clerk has read by its title is first in order and must be proceeded with unless laid aside by a vote of the committee.

Mr. MAYHAM. I move that that bill and all other bills which on the Calendar have priority of House bill No. 4810 be laid aside.

Mr. EDEN. I rise to a question of order. That motion, I submit, is not in order. Each bill must be acted upon separately.

Mr. MAYHAM. I move, then, that the bill just read by its title be laid aside.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDEN. I move that the committee rise and report to the House the bills that have been acted on.

Mr. MAYHAM. I move that House bill No. 4810 be taken up.

Mr. EDEN. My motion takes precedence.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN,] that the committee rise and report to the House the bills which have been acted on.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FINLEY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration business from the Committee for the District of Columbia, had directed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

RATE OF INTEREST ON DISTRICT BONDS.

The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. No. 5683) to amend an act approved June 20, 1878, and to fix the rate of interest on bonds authorized by said act to be issued by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. HUNTON. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE POTOMAC.

The SPEAKER. The next question is on the bill (H. R. No. 942) to authorize the Secretary of War to construct a bridge across the Potomac River at or near the Three Sisters Islands, reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with amendments.

Mr. HUNTON demanded the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments were concurred in. The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MAYHAM. I am directed by the Committee for the District of Columbia to ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4810) to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes.

Mr. EDEN. I move the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 111, noes 37.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with section 4690 of the Revised Statutes, a report by Carlisle P. He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, calling the attention of the Senate to estimates of appropriations required for the subsistence of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, reported on page 70 of the Book of Estimates for 1879–'80; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Quartermaster-General in reference to an appropriation of $25,000 for barracks at Fortress Monroe, Virginia, and suggesting that a further sum of $34,000 be granted to complete the barracks building at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. WINDOM, it was—

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was—

Ordered, That the committee on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice-President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. BLAINE, and Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 5514) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872, and for former years, and for other purposes," approved May 18, 1872—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. No. 5532) authorizing the donation of twenty condemned bronze cannon to aid in the erection of a monument to the memory of General George A. Custer at the Military Academy at West Point—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 206) providing for the distribution of the Revised Statutes of the United States to the Post-Office Department—to the Committee on Printing.

COURTS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

The bill (H. R. No. 5535) changing the time of holding the terms of the United States circuit court for the district of West Virginia was read twice by its title.

Mr. HEREFORD. I ask the Senate to consider the bill at this time. It is purely a local matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to a third reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read at length on its third reading.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That hereafter the circuit court of the United States for the district of West Virginia shall be held at Parkersburgh on the 10th day of January and of June, and when either of said days shall fall on Sunday the terms shall commence on the following Monday; and all pending cases, process, rules, and proceedings shall be conducted in the same manner and with the same effect as to time as if this act had not been passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to interfere with what is the local interest of West Virginia, but I desire to inquire of the Senators from that State if it is not a very inconvenient arrangement to have a term of a court to begin on a certain day of the month, instead of having it begin on some Monday or Tuesday or Wednesday. The 10th day of the month may fall on Saturday or Friday.

Mr. HEREFORD. I see no trouble about the provisions of the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. Or the 10th may fall on Sunday, for that matter.

Mr. HOAR. The bill provides for that.

Mr. HEREFORD. I desire simply to say that this bill, as I am informed by my colleague in the House who represents that immediate district, was introduced at the request of Judge Bond, the circuit judge, so as to suit his convenience for the other courts that he has to hold in different parts of the circuit; and the time of meeting cannot fall on Sunday, by the provisions of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I understand; but I do not think the Senator sees my point. As I understand the arrangements for terms of court, both United States courts and State courts, as a rule in this country, we fix the day as on a certain Monday of the month or a certain Tuesday, or a certain Monday or other day after the first Monday. To require them to begin at a certain day of the month brings the beginning of the term, when jurors, witnesses, parties, the bar, the judge, have to be present, perhaps on a Saturday, perhaps on Friday, the most inconvenient day for the commencement of the term of a court. That for the convenience of the judge alone such great inconvenience should be done to the public seems to me a strange thing. If the Senators from that State insist upon having that inconvenient arrangement made for their people I do not suppose it is the business of anybody else to object.

Mr. HEREFORD. The time fixed is suitable to the members of the bar, the attorneys, and all parties, and the bill relates to West Virginia alone.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McDONALD. The Committee on Public Lands have had under consideration the bill (S. No. 1330) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes, recommitted to them on the 13th of the present month, and have directed me to report it back again to the Senate favorably and to recommend its passage. I also ask that it be placed on the Calendar in the order in which it stood at the time of its recommittal.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To this the Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SPENCER. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Horatio D. Jarves, suggesting defects in the pension laws, and praying the amendment thereof, to report the same back to the Senate, and to say that it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs through mistake. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1434) to compensate George W. Morse for his labor and expenses in adapting his system of breech-loading fire-arms and ammunition to the arms of the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Patents; which was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom were referred the following petition, memorials, and message from the President of the United States, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

Mr. DORSEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, presented certain plans for the improvement of the sewerage and the sanitary condition of the District of Columbia, submitted to the committee under the authority of a resolution adopted by the Senate June 13, 1878; which were recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5484) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1880, reported it with amendments.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1492) to amend section 15 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1878, reported it with amendments.

ANDREW MUCKLE.

Mr. PLUMB. I am also instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5485) for the relief of Andrew Muckle, to report it without amendment, and I am also instructed by the committee to ask the immediate consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Adjutant-General of the Army to remove any charge of desertion which may stand on his records against Andrew Muckle, late a private in Compaay F of the Fifteenth Regiment of Michigan Infantry Volunteers, and to forthwith grant him an honorable discharge. And the Commissioner of the General Land Office is directed to extend the time for proving up the homestead entry of Andrew Muckle, No. 4745, made at the United States land office, then at Traverse City, Michigan, on the 2d of January, 1872.

Mr. McDONALD. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. PLUMB. There is no written report, but I will state to the Senate briefly the facts in the case. This man Muckle is an Irishman unnaturalized, who enlisted in the Federal service in 1862. He served in the campaign that resulted in the battles of Shiloh and Vicksburgh, and re-enlisted as a veteran. He went home with his regiment on furlough in 1864, after a little more than two years continuous and active service. He did not go back with his regiment. About 1870 or 1871 he went into one of the frontier counties of Michigan and went upon a piece of land, designing to take it as a homestead, and in fact made an entry of it as required under the practice of the Land Office. When he came to prove it he ascertained for the first time that it was necessary that he should be naturalized. He sought to be naturalized, but was confronted with the charge of desertion against him in the military service by reason of his not having gone with his regiment after his furlough expired. He has now been upon the land nearly seven years, and the time will expire on the 2d of January next. In order to perfect his entry he must either have his time extended or he must be naturalized before that time, or at least have his first papers filed. He cannot do that as long as the charge of desertion remains against him. The evidence is complete. The House suspended the rules and passed the bill by a unanimous vote, believing it to be an extraordinary case. The Military Committee of the Senate took the same view of it and authorized me to report the bill favorably and request that it be considered now, for the reason that if it goes over the holidays the whole purpose of the bill will have failed by lapse of time. I think, as the committee thought, that it is a very meritorious case, and one that would establish no precedent.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to this bill on the statement which the Senator from Kansas has made, but does not the beneficiary have a remedy at the War Department? Is not the War Department authorized to remove the charge of desertion?

Mr. PLUMB. No.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am satisfied.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRINTING OF A REPORT.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the select committee to make provision for taking the Tenth Census to ask leave to have printed the report of the remarks of Francis A. Walker made before that committee last evening.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order will be entered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GORDON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1525) for the relief of Robert Habersham, George Patten, and John L. Villalonga, or their executors or administrators; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1526) granting a pension to Phœbe Parke; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McDONALD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1527) for the relief of John J. Key and W. G. M. Davis; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HEREFORD (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1528) for the relief of William W. Morrow; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1529) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to adjust and fix the water rates within said District; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1530) to grant a pension to John G. McDonald; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EUSTIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 45) authorizing the President to appoint Dr. William Martin a full surgeon in the United States Navy; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. EUSTIS. As the joint resolution is very short I ask to have it read the second time at length.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be reported at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

Whereas Dr. William Martin, acting assistant surgeon United States Navy, now on duty on the United States monitor Canonicus, distinguished himself during the late yellow-fever epidemic by attending to the sick of the Grand Army of the Republic in New Orleans by promptly responding to the call made upon him by the Howard and other associations, by tendering his services gratuitously; and

Whereas it is important that there should be in the Navy physicians conversant with the treatment of yellow fever: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, Dr. William Martin a full surgeon in the United States Navy, to date from August 1, 1878.

Mr. BURNSIDE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 46) to authorize Lieutenant Francis V. Greene, United States Army, to accept certain decorations from the Emperor of Russia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. MORGAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 942) amendatory of and supplementary to the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, and the several acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. SAUNDERS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5218) to establish post-roads in the several States herein named; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. BLAINE. I believe the order of yesterday holds its position.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It does. The resolutions of the Senator from Maine are the unfinished business.

Mr. BLAINE. I have to request the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that he will not call up the naval appropriation bill for a few days. I desire to submit some remarks upon it, and I am not now ready to do so.

Mr. WINDOM. In response to the request of the Senator from Maine I shall not press the naval appropriation bill, but I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the consular and diplomatic bill, to which I think there is no objection, and doubtless it can be passed in a very few minutes.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator thinks it can be passed between now and the hour of one, I have no objection.

Mr. WINDOM. I think it can, or very soon thereafter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the motion of the Senator from Minnesota that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLAINE. That is subject of course to the regular order. That will not displace the order after the morning hour?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Not after one o'clock.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 5312) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. WINDOM. Before the reading of the bill I will very briefly state the amendments proposed by the Senate committee. The bill as it came to the Senate appropriates $1,045,735. The net additions recommended by the Senate committee amount to $82,100. As reported from the Senate committee the bill is $50,800 less than the estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and it is $40,200 more than the appropriations for the current year. The increase over the appropriations for the current year is composed of items which were in the bill when it came to the Senate, as follows:

For chargés d'affaires ad interim and diplomatic officers abroad, $20,000.

Second secretaries to legation of Great Britain, France, and Germany, $6,000.

Clerk to legation at Spain, $1,200.

Exposes of revising and editing consular regulations, $3,000.

For diplomatic and consular service to be expended in the discretion of the President, $20,000.

Maxing a total of $50,200 of items which are in the bill as it came to the Senate, but which are not in the act for the current year.

The $82,100 added by the Senate Committee on Appropriations is composed of items which make the bill correspond I believe exactly, or at least substantially, to the appropriations for the current year, which the committee believe to be the lowest amount that will properly serve the purposes of the Government.

They have restored the salaries to ministers to Great Britain, France, Germany, and Russia, which added, $10,000.

The restoration of salaries for the missions to Spain, Austria, Italy, Brazil, Mexico, Japan, and China, $14,000.

The restoration of salaries of ministers to Chili and Peru, $4,000.

Restoring minister to the Argentine Republic, and chargés d'affaires to Paraguay and Urugnay in lieu of minister plenipotentiary as in House bill, $4,500.

Restoring missions to Belgium and Netherlands, $15,000.

Salary of minister to Hayti, $2,500.

To Liberia, $1,500.

Restoring missions to Denmark and Switzerland, $10,000.

Salary of consul-general at Cairo, $1,000.

Salaries of consuls-general at London, Paris, Havana, and Rio, $4,000.

Salary of consul-general at Melbourne, $500, and at Berlin, $1,000.

Salary of consuls-general at Vienna, Frankfort, Rome, and Constantinople, $2,000.

Restoring classes of consuls, that is, restoring consuls to the classes in which they are this year, $14,600.

All of these additions are simply to restore the salaries named in the bill to the amounts now fixed by law, and appropriated for the current year, and I believe there is nothing else of any importance embraced in the amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read by the Secretary at length.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask that the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations be acted on in their order as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be pursued.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. PADDOCK. I have an amendment, which the members of the committee have agreed to, I believe.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It can be admitted now by unanimous consent.

Mr. PADDOCK. I was conferring with the chairman of the committee while the question was being put. I desire after the word "Dresden," in line 147, to insert "Chemnitz."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there unanimous consent that this amendment be made? The Chair hears no objection, and it is made.

Mr. PADDOCK. One more. In line 171, where the word "Chemnitz" occurs I move to strike it out.

Mr. BLAINE. That makes it conform to the other.

Mr. PADDOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. WINDOM. There is no objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand there was a single amendment made.

Mr. PADDOCK. That is all.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Which adds a clerk. Is that it?

Mr. PADDOCK. No; but changes the classification.

Mr. WINDOM. Adds something to the compensation of the consul of Chemnitz, where the fees are large and the compensation very small. I think the proposition is meritorious, though it has not all the formalities.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is made.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EXERCISE OF ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate now proceeds to the consideration of its unfinished business, being the resolutions introduced by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] the pending question being on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine, which will be reported.

The SECRETARY. In the third resolve, after the word "right," it is proposed to insert the words "by itself or by any subcommittee," and after the word "paper," at the end of the resolution, to insert "to take testimony, to administer oaths, and to visit any portion of the country when such visit may in their judgment facilitate the object of the inquiry;" so as to make the resolution read:

That in prosecuting these inquiries the committee shall have the right, by itself or by any subcommittee, to send for persons and papers, to take testimony, to administer oaths, and to visit any portion of the country when such visit may in their judgment facilitate the object of the inquiry.

Mr. BLAINE. I thought that was agreed to nem. con.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was not.

Mr. MERRIMON. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that the amendment ought to be amended so as to provide what member of the committee shall administer the oath. It should provide that the chairman or presiding officer of the subcommittee should administer oaths.

Mr. BLAINE. The object was to give the authority to such subcommittees as might be designated.

Mr. MERRIMON. I remember that on a former occasion on looking at the subject we had difficulty about that very point, and it was provided that the chairman of the committee, or the chairman of any subcommittee should administer oaths.

Mr. BLAINE. I have no objection to the Senator from North Carolina making that point more definite. That can be arranged afterward; I will not interrupt the Senator if he wants the floor now.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator from North Carolina will be kind enough to allow an explanation he will very much oblige me. I felt compelled to leave the Senate yesterday because I was suffering under indisposition, having the severest cold that I believe I ever felt. I had no disposition for business, and no disposition for company. Before leaving, however, I understood the regular order, the bill in relation to patents, would be taken up after the morning hour and would consume the day. However, if I had not known that, I doubt whether I should have remained during the day.

I will simply add that I had no purpose of taking any part in the discussion of these resolutions, especially in the present stage of them. Whether I shall do so hereafter, after the report shall have been made, I am not now able to say.

I desired simply to state that if I had been present yesterday I should have taken very great pleasure in voting for the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] and which was lost by a tie vote. While as a general rule I think committees of investigation ought to be allowed to determine for themselves whether they will have open or secret sessions, while as a general rule I think it is better to leave it to them, in this particular case I should have voted for the amendment to require open doors.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to advert to anything that transpired in the debate on the pending resolutions yesterday. For one, I am willing that that discussion shall stand as it is recorded. I shall refer to remarks that were made on these resolutions last week.

Mr. President, I listened with feelings of mingled surprise and indignation at the fierce and unprovoked assault upon the white people of the South made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] in his speech delivered on Wednesday last. I was surprised at hearing one so able and filling so dignified and important a station speak so loosely and illogically, and indignant at the grave charges he made against and the gross aspersions he cast upon a whole people without specifying a single fact other than the sheerest partisan newspaper scandal to sustain what he said. I cannot deny the physical power of that Senator to thus abuse the dignity and patience of this body; but he cannot make it right to do so, he cannot escape just criticism nor the adverse judgment of all men, wherever they may be, who love justice, truth, and honor. Whatever may have been the purpose of this extraordinary speech—it seems to me, however, that this is manifest—it certainly can serve only to create sensation, engender groundless discontents, revive sectional hate, bitterness, and distrust, and rearray the colored people against the white people of the South, and by this means continue to impair the much-needed unity of feeling among the American people, injure their industries, and retard their business intercourse, their trade, and commerce. Such a speech may adorn the splendid abilities, illustrate the high patriotic spirit, and gratify the noble ambition of some men; but I cannot suppose for one moment that there can be found many who think so, or who will envy the author of it because of the laurels it affords him, or take delight in sharing the fruits of such a triumph. I give the Senator high praise for the boldness and courtly polish of his assertions, while I express my profound gratification that they are neither founded in fact nor justice toward millions of intelligent freemen living in the southern section of the Union. I take notice of his fiery wrath, but I beg to say that I neither tremble at his empty threats nor dread the scrutiny of any committee that may be charged to inquire into the truth of his allegations.

Mr. President, the nature of society and all experience go to show that peace, good order, mutual confidence, respect, and forbearance among the people are essential to the preservation and perpetuity of states and nations. These things are likewise necessary to the individual and collective prosperity, happiness, and unity of every people. It is just as true that persecution, oppression, public discord, sectional strife, bitterness, and dislike, destroy national unity, subvert liberty, pervert the moral sense of communities, degrade human nature, impede industries, strike down all prosperity, stimulate open violence, light up the flames of civil war, and establish the bloody despotism of mobs and factions. The ample page of history records in fearful array the downfall of empires, kingdoms, and republics, attributable wholly to one or more of the causes just mentioned. History likewise records the names of the authors of such mischiefs—their rise, their temporary triumphs, the evils they did, the crimes they perpetrated against society and humanity, their fall, and in many instances, perpetuates their infamy.

These general truths apply with peculiar emphasis to our own country. We have a great republic, founded upon the great doctrines of rational liberty, freedom of conscience, freedom of thought and expression, and the right of the people to rule themselves. We have a government of public sentiment as contradistinguished from a government of force—a government that rests upon the virtue, intelligence, patriotism, and unity of the people. These are the essential elements of its life; without them, it cannot live. To the end that our country may have the fullest measure of national blessing, we want and must have peace, harmony of sections, mutual respect and forbearance, reconciliation one section with another. Sectional jealousies and feuds must be broken down and exterminated, misrepresentation and detraction must cease, and love of country must be greater than love of party. The peace and good order of society ought always to be above all party considerations.

The greatest dangers this country has encountered in the whole course of its existence have arisen from sectional controversies and sectional intolerance. These controversies, on repeated occasions, seriously threatened the peace of the people and the safety of the Government, until in 1860 they resulted in bringing on our late civil war, which cost the American people myriads of precious lives, unutterable suffering and agony, and many billions of treasure. There was no natural or reasonable cause for those strifes. They were fomented, lashed into fury and war by ambitious, seditious, and dangerous men seeking notoriety and their own personal advantage and aggrandizement. Will the American people—the people of the North and the South, of the East and the West—not take warning and profit by the awful experience of the past? Will the people of the North and the South not pause and calmly consider, like enlightened freemen, whether there is any reasonable cause for difference and strife? Will the people continue to allow ambitious men, whether from one section or the other, to excite their prejudices and enrage their passions without a cause? Will the people of any section in the future, as has been too often done in the past, follow in the lead of men who are only fitted by their talents and tastes to stir up strife and foster discord? Mr. President, I trust not; I trust that reason, truth, and justice—and not passion and prejudice—will sway the minds and control the judgments of the northern people and the southern people; that they will see and realize in their thoughts and conduct that their truest, best, and highest interests can only be subserved by the earnest cultivation of the arts of peace and good-will toward each other.

Mr. President, the whole speech of the Senator from Maine goes on the single false assumption that the colored people of the South are practically despoiled of their right to vote by the white people there by the employment of force and fraud. This assumption underlies and permeates all he said. And putting aside the right of the colored people and the supposed injury done them, he says that while they are a factor in fixing the ratio of representation in Congress and give the South thirty-five additional members in the House of Representatives, they do not in fact vote, and hence a white man in North Carolina in voting is equal to two white men in Maine. If his assumption is unfounded, then all he has said goes for nothing.

The Senator does not cite a single fact nor any verified statement in support of this grave allegation. I undertake to say he cannot do so, and challenge him to the proof. I believe it to be true that in some instances in more than one State colored voters have been interfered with by force and perhaps by fraud in the exercise of their right to vote, just as white men have been interfered with in other States in the exercise of their similar right; but that this has been generally done, or to such an extent as to materially affect the colored vote, I utterly deny. This has not been and cannot be shown, according to my observation, information, and firm belief; and in the course of my remarks I propose to advert to public facts, circumstances, and records that go strongly to show the contrary.

The suggestion that there is a general conspiracy or concerted purpose throughout the South to deprive the colored people of the right to vote is so improbable and so monstrous as to carry with it its own refutation. There is neither motive nor opportunity for so wicked and foolish a movement. I cannot suppose that there is a single intelligent being who believes it.

The Senator complains bitterly that the democrats in the South seized seventy-three districts, and by such means, out of one hundred and six Representatives, elected one hundred and one or two of them. He says that in two or three States the colored voters were in the majority, and with this state of facts he infers that the colored voters were prevented by force and fraud from voting. This inference is unwarranted and unjust, as I will now endeavor to show, and more at length in the general course of what I have further to say.

The public statistical election reports show that large colored votes were generally cast at the late and former elections for the republican party, but these seldom of late made a majority. It is certain that the colored vote was generally cast. I present a table showing the vote in the States named for President at the elections in 1868, 1872, and 1876. I have not been able to get later data. It is as follows:

Vote in sundry States.

	1868.		1872.		1876.
	Grant.	Seymour.	Grant.	Greeley.	Hayes.	Tilden.

Virginia	.....	.....	93,468	91,654	95,538	139,670

This shows that the vote was cast, and generally with some increase. If it is asked how the white vote came to be so increased at late elections, the answer is that until within the last few years thousands and tens of thousands of white people would not vote at all. Some were stubborn; others were hopeless, and believed it idle to vote. This feeling has given way almost entirely. The people have recovered spirit and hope and confidence, and earnestly start anew.

It is a noteworthy and important fact, that thousands of colored men through the South have abandoned the republican party and voluntarily joined the democratic party, regarding their interests as leading them to do so. This is more generally so in some localities than in others, and the number that do so, increases at every succeeding election and as the colored voters increase in intelligence and the acquisition of property. Then, there are other thousands who have grown indifferent about voting—the novelty of it has worn out with them; oftentimes they have been deceived and misled by unscrupulous white leaders and they have grown disgusted with misrule which they have seen and felt; they do not want to vote with the republican party, nor yet with the democratic party, but their tendency is to go with the latter in the future. This is my observation to some extent. The evidence taken before a subcommittee of the Senate of which I was a member two years ago showed this to be true to a large extent in South Carolina. It is in fact to the decided interest of the colored voters to vote with the white people, and they will do so more and more as they shall be left to follow their own judgments and learn by the logic of events, which they understand best, their true interests. The statistics show that in North Carolina the colored vote—it is there mainly republican—was at the late election as large in proportion as the white vote. There can be no pretense that there was intimidation there.

I remember well that it was alleged in 1876 that the election in South Carolina was carried by force and intimidation, and the colored people were then practically deprived of their right to vote. But the returns showed that the republican party received at that election nearly ten thousand more votes than at any former election, and the evidence taken before our subcommittee showed that intimidation did not materially affect the vote. At that time there was a greater outcry made by republican politicians about fraud and force in that State than there is now. It is a notable fact that the outcry about intimidation of the colored voters in the South comes on periodically just before the presidential election, and this circumstance points strongly to the motive for it.

It is complained, and with much bitterness, of the democrats of the South, that by reason of the enfranchisement of the colored people the late slave-holding States have thirty-five additional members of the House of Representatives, and yet the republican party do not get the benefit of these additional Representatives or a large part of them. With all due respect to every one who so complains, I must say that this is caviling, trifling, and puerile. The colored vote does not belong to the republican party of right; it does not belong to the democratic party of right; it does not belong to any party of right; the colored voters are just as free to vote with one party as another; they are freemen, at perfect liberty to vote for any party they may see fit, to vote without regard to any party, or to abstain from voting altogether. It does not follow because the republican party failed to elect more Congressmen that the colored people were forced to vote the democratic ticket or to abstain from voting. As is seen, a great variety of considerations may have led and may yet lead them to vote against the republican party or not to vote at all.

But I submit, in all candor, that it is unjust to complain of the white people of the South because of the increased representation of that section of the Union by reason of the operation of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution. They did not ask for it; they made no effort to obtain it. At the time the amendments were adopted the southern people were prostrate and helpless under the sword. They were not consulted about it. They experienced grave apprehension of danger, of evil to spring from enfranchising the freedmen, and many of them uttered a feeble, fruitless protest against it; but the republican party, under circumstances of oppression, humiliation, and outrage, literally forced it upon them by the sword, and sought practically to place eight millions of intelligent white people under the dominion of four millions of colored people, who had just then been liberated, having been the slaves of the white people, and at a time when the colored people had scarcely the feeblest knowledge of government.

In the whole history of mankind there cannot be found a precedent for a measure so severe, so humiliating to the whole people, and so extraordinary in the great number of possibilities it afforded for direful consequences and the small number for salutary ones. The history of the times shows that in the early period of reconstruction the elections in the South were sheer mockeries. They were held under military orders and the sword. Every male colored man over twenty-one years of age was allowed to vote and thousands under that age voted, while thousands among the wisest and best white men were not allowed to vote. While the sword was held over the white people, the colored people ruled. I do not care here to advert to the terrible fruits of the misrule that then prevailed. These have in good degree passed by; peace, order, good-will between the races, stable, wholesome government and slowly increasing prosperity have been restored; and I confidently believe and trust that a glorious future lies before the southern people as a whole. When I consider the temperature of their climate, the richness of their soil, the great variety of their productions, their vast forests, their mineral resources, their mighty rivers, their capacious harbors, and their outlets to the ocean highways of the world—when I consider their capabilities, their spirit as a people, their love of liberty, and their relations to this great and free Republic, I cannot doubt that the "sunny South" is destined in the near future to be the home of ever-increasing millions of prosperous and happy people and the richest section of the Union

Let the shrieks of the agitator and the political alarmist be hushed; let sectional criminations and recriminations cease; let business confidence be restored; let industry and all the arts of peace be encouraged and labor dignified and rewarded; let peace, blessed peace, do its office in restoring confidence and good-will between the white man and the black man, between the North and the South and the East and the West, and soon, very soon, even the slenderest pretext for such agitations as that which now engages our attention will utterly disappear.

Why, sir, as going to show that this is true and that this exciting debate is unnecessary, I call special attention to the fact that the democratic party rules in every Southern State to-day, and has for several years in most of the States. As a result, peace, order, the due administration of law, and reviving prosperity prevail everywhere. Is this not a striking fact? Are not good men everywhere glad of it? Is it not infinitely better that this should be so than that the whole country should be cursed with disgraceful and ruinous contentions and outbreaks that lately prevailed there under other rule? Let no one say that the colored man has no protection. Go and see him in his home and his daily pursuits, and his condition, like that of the white man, is slowly and surely improving. He is cheerful and hopeful.

And there is this other striking fact that cannot fail to impress every one seeking for the truth: that the white people of the South, having the political power, have by their organic laws and their legislation provided for protecting the lives, the liberties, the property, and the education of the colored people by the same means and in the same measure that they have for their own like interests. The constitutions of the Southern States, their public laws, and the records of the courts, their public charities and systems of public education show beyond question that what I have stated is true in all material respects. Is any man so steeped in prejudice as that he believes all this a sheer pretense, a hollow mockery? I cannot think so.

There is naturally no hostility between the colored people and the white people of the South. The colored people are poor; unhappily most of them are ignorant and dependent; they need the aid and the protection of the white people, and the white people need their aid more or less. Each race has an interest in the other, and my observation teaches me that the colored man never appeals without success to the intelligent white man to aid him in enforcing his rights. But it is said the white man controls the colored man, and this is unnatural, and therefore he must do this by force or fraud. This is a grave mistake. Generally, in the natural order of things, the white man will control the colored man, not necessarily by force or fraud—far from it—but by showing the latter that his interests properly lead him to do or to abstain from doing certain things and to pursue a particular line of action. The white man is generally the more intelligent. Intelligence, superior wisdom, will assert itself over ignorance, no matter whether the ignorance be that of a white man or a colored man. This is natural and orderly. The white man is better qualified in most instances in the present condition of the colored people, by opportunity, experience, and intelligence to judge of what ought or ought not to be done. This is so in business transactions, and no one complains at that. Why should it not be so in political matters? I have a perfect right to convince a colored man that he ought to vote as I do, to vote with the party with which I vote. I may convince him by argument, by persuasion, or I may induce him to do so by pointing him to the good results of placing democrats or good men without regard to parties, in office. Colored men learn more rapidly by the logic of events than in any other way. When he sees that the white people, the democrats, rule, and that wholesome results follow; that he has schools provided for him; that law is regularly enforced; that peace and order prevail; that he can appeal with confidence to the courts; that he is safe from violence and outrage, how naturally he falls into the support of the men who secure these fruits! And it seems to me that every good man ought to be glad and rejoice that this is so, no matter where he may live. Wholesome government for the white man and the black man is of infinitely more importance than the temporary success or fortunes of any political party. If the best interests of the colored people lead them under their circumstances to vote with the democratic party, let them do so, and no one has any right to complain. And when new issues and new parties spring up in the South and the whole people divide politically, as they will sooner or later, it may be expected that the colored people will do likewise, some going one way and some another.

The Senator intimates, it seems to me, very plainly that an effort will be made, if the republican party cannot get as many votes in the South as it may deem necessary, that the increased representation of that section by reason of the enfranchisement of the colored people will be taken away. I tell that Senator that this is easier said than done. The South will never consent to this, and in opposing any movement of that kind he will certainly find the white men and the colored men standing solidly together. The white men of the South will never see the colored men despoiled of their rights in that respect. Never! never!

The Senator with an air of lofty menace tells the men of the South in and beyond this Chamber that they can never permanently make a white man's vote in the South doubly as powerful in the administration of the government as a white man's vote in the North. Sir, there has been no occasion for this boasting threat. No one here or elsewhere, so far as I have ever heard, has asked for it or anything like it. Southern men do not ask it; they would scorn to have it. They neither ask nor want any the slightest advantage over their fellow-countrymen of the North. All they ask, all they want, whether white or black men, is to have their rights here and elsewhere under the Constitution of their common country in the same measure and on the same footing of equality with their northern fellow-citizens. They cheerfully recognize the right of their northern countrymen to have and enjoy all this in the largest measure; as freemen knowing their rights, they will be content with nothing less for themselves. While they recognize the rights of others and will uphold them, they will firmly insist upon their own here and elsewhere. They neither fear nor regard the empty threats of malice or revenge.

I deplore and deprecate the tone, the spirit and the manner of the speech of the Senator from Maine. It is not for me to assign motives to him, but I must say that in my judgment the only effect it can have is that I have already indicated. I believe that it had been better for the whole country if he had not made it. I regret his language of menace and that he saw fit to overleap the proprieties of this Chamber and refer to the Senators here representing the Southern States as "men of the South," and not as Senators. His speech is the more to be deplored because, as we saw, it was prepared and delivered with great care and deliberation, showing that he spoke not from the impulse of the occasion, but of studied purpose and determination.

Now, sir, I can assure the Senate and the country that the people of North Carolina, and I believe I can say so of the people of the whole South, do not desire any controversy with the people of the North; on the contrary, they desire perfect peace and reconciliation on terms of respectful, mutual good-will. I trust, I believe, a like spirit animates the great body of the northern people. The whole country needs peace and quiet—the people demand this, and whoever supposes that the people in the North or the South are ready to revive bitter controversies fruitful of evil only is very much mistaken. But in order to have peace and harmony, the people must smite with the withering blast of their condemnation those seditious agitators who stir up strife and foment discord. If the American people in all sections will demand and insist upon national unity, good will and concord, they may have these blessings, and prosperity will come as a natural consequence. Only by such means can our noble free institutions be made perpetual.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, my views upon this resolution are well understood upon this side of the Chamber, and the motion I made yesterday to lay the whole subject upon the table was prompted by those opinions. The country is sick of political agitation and sectional turmoil. This resolution initiates a renewal of the bitterness of party and partisan investigation that has cursed the country for years. Every business interest in the State I represent prays for rest from political agitation and for time to recuperate its wasted energy. This cannot be while the country is aroused and shaken up by investigations based upon rumor and party rancor is stirred to its depths in every section. I would, if I could, have arrayed every one on this side of the Chamber in decided and open antagonism to this reopening of the flood-gates of party strife. But by a nearly unanimous vote the Senate has decided otherwise, and all that is left for us to do is to proceed with the investigation in an honest spirit of seeking for truth. No practical result can come from this inquiry. The Constitution and laws as declared by the Supreme Court settle that. The second section of the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution is:

> Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

In the case of the United States vs. Cruikshank, 2 Otto, 542, and kindred cases, the Supreme Court, commenting on this article and construing it, say:

> The fourteenth amendment prohibits a State from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, and from denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; but it adds nothing to the rights of one citizen as against another. It simply furnishes an additional guarantee against any encroachment by the States upon the fundamental rights which belong to every citizen as a member of society. The duty of protecting all its citizens in the enjoyment of an equality of rights was originally assumed by the States, and it still remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. This the amendment guarantees, but no more. The power of the National Government is limited to the enforcement of this guarantee.

This is the decision of a court unanimous with a single exception, and he a democrat. If this be the law, how can we take representation from a State for what is done by individuals? The investigation, even if the facts be proved, is useless. The remedy is by a contest for the seat, and not by sectional agitation. The purposes of this resolution, stated by its author, are to record frauds and outrages on recent elections in the Southern States and to find a method to prevent them. The newspaper press is given as the authority for their existence. The laws provide a remedy for the wrongs alleged, if they exist, by a contest for the seat held through such processes, and that peaceful mode of adjustment is, I believe, in the judgment of the country infinitely better than sweeping allegations based upon newspaper rumors and passionate partisan appeals which must embitter the sections. Peace and law are the methods now to be sought. Passion and partisanship have ceased to inflame the minds of business men. Business and its cares, the restoration of a market for our products and the means for material growth and development in every locality, are the ends our people seek. I should not enter this arena now, thinking as I do, save to correct error and to vindicate so far as I can, from my stand-point as a northern Senator, the truth of recent political history.

It is stated as a fact, based upon newspaper rumor, that elections in the Southern States have been controlled by violence, threats, and intimidations; that they have been manipulated by fraud, and that in one State "there was no election at all in any sense of the term." If these statements be true it is surprising that out of the whole number of Congressmen elected from that section, 106 in number, not more than six members have been notified of a contest for the seats they hold, and the thirty days allowed by law for that purpose have expired. This in itself is a complete and perfect answer to these broad charges of fraud and violence as applied to the whole section. The laws provide the remedy. It is largely unsought. The wrong, if it exists, is local, and cannot affect general results. Why raise investigating committees? Why arouse sectional bitterness? Why refuse to seek the remedy the law provides? The practical sense of our business people will have no more of this useless and senseless agitation. Their answer will be, let the laws rule, give us rest from political turmoil. It is conceded that practical results cannot come from it unless we can overthrow the constitutional amendment and the decisions of the Supreme Court, and this ought to be sufficient to end the strife.

It is not correct that thirty-five of the Representatives allotted to the Southern States were given them since the war by reason of the negro population. Under the Constitution as originally framed three-fifths thereof were represented, and this representation of the then slave population was attacked with vigor in the heated contest that preceded the war. After the war, and when reconstruction came, the policy of the republican party was reversed, and "manhood suffrage" became the shibboleth of party with them. Under this doctrine the republican Congress of 1872 added not thirty-five but twenty members to the representation of the Southern States in the House of Representatives. The right, the power, and the expediency to do this and to fix unalterably the equality of the black voter of the South and the North with the white voter everywhere was the leading feature of the reconstruction policy of the Senator from Maine and those with whom he acted. The fatal error into which they fell was in failing to qualify the right to the enfranchised slave by fastening upon it an educational test. This would not serve their political ends, and reconstruction as they constructed it has proved their own political destruction. The absolute equality in fitness for self-government of the uneducated negro of the South with the trained and educated white man everywhere was the basis of the plan. It was unsound and false, and has returned to plague its authors. The Senator from Maine impales himself by his arguments. Negro suffrage as a political policy is a failure in the South, and he helped to create it. His arguments are logically an arraignment of the vicious methods of those who acted with him in placing political power in the hands of an unfit agent. The work has been done by you, and its results do not please you. What is your remedy? To overthrow the amendments, nullify the decisions of the courts, and agitate until you succeed? Ours is to obey the amendments in their letter, to sustain the decisions of the Supreme Court, and to protect by law, encourage by fair treatment, educate and elevate the black man until his capacity is fully tested. Yours is to take from him representation, disfranchise and degrade him. Such, at least, is the logical result of your efforts and your arguments. The issue is not whether the white voter of the North shall be the equal of the white voter of the South in shaping the policy of the country. They have always been and are now the equals and peers of each other. The legitimate and lawful influence that each can wield is as much his right as is his life. Whether North or South, the brave, intelligent, and upright man is justly powerful, and he who seeks to lessen his power or weaken his influence stabs his country.

It is not correct in point of fact that the white voter of the South wields a greater influence than the white voter of the North. The Senator from Maine gathers together whole masses of population in the North and argues from population and not from voters. I quote his words:

> Take the States of South Carolina, Mississippi, and Louisiana. They send seventeen Representatives to Congress. Their aggregate population is composed of ten hundred and thirty-five thousand whites and and twelve hundred and twenty-four thousand colored; the colored being nearly two hundred thousand in excess of the whites. Of the seventeen Representatives, then, it is evident that nine were apportioned to these States by reason of their colored population, and only eight by reason of their white population; and yet in the choice of the entire seventeen Representatives the colored voters had no more voice or power than their remote kindred on the shores of Senegambia or on the Gold Coast. The ten hundred and thirty-five thousand white people had the sole and absolute choice of the entire seventeen Representatives. In contrast, take two States in the North, Iowa and Wisconsin, with seventeen Representatives. They have a white population of two million two hundred and forty-seven thousand—considerably more than double the entire white population of the three Southern States I have named. In Iowa and Wisconsin, therefore, it takes one hundred and thirty-two thousand white population to send a Representative to Congress, but in South Carolina, Mississippi, and Louisiana every sixty thousand white people send a Representative.

The first fallacy in this proposition is the bold assumption that the colored voters had no voice or power in the recent elections. Who gives any one authority to say this? Is it true that the republican party possesses an indefeasible estate in every colored voter in those States? Have they no liberty of thought or right of independent action? Are their votes not to be counted unless they vote the republican ticket? Such a statement as this is utterly unwarranted by facts, for we all know that in very many instances the colored voter is independent in action. Upon the presidential vote of 1876 in those States the seventeen democratic members elected had a total of 272,805 votes and their opponents had a total of 219,610 votes. The minority were just as much represented as they are in any congressional district in the North. They voted and they were outvoted. How unfairly the contrast is put. Iowa and Wisconsin had in 1876 a voting population of 540,108. Of these, 296,595, representing about twelve hundred thousand people, were republicans, and 243,503, representing about one million people, were democrats. If the negroes who voted for the republican candidates in the Southern States named are not to be counted, the democrats who voted for their own candidates in Iowa and Wisconsin ought not to be counted. The democrats elected in the South represent the minority there just as much as the republicans elected in the North represent the minority there.

The Senator from Maine says:

> The eleven States that formed the Confederate Government had by the last census a population of nine and a half millions, of which in round numbers five and a half millions were white and four millions colored. On this aggregate population seventy-three Representatives in Congress were apportioned to those States—forty-two or three of which were by reason of the white population, and thirty or thirty-one by reason of the colored population. At the recent election the white democracy of the South seized seventy of the seventy-three districts, and thus secured a democratic majority in the next House of Representatives. Thus it appears that throughout the States that formed the late Confederate Government sixty-five thousand whites—the very people that rebelled against the Union—are enabled to elect a Representative in Congress, while in the loyal States it requires one hundred and thirty-two thousand of the white people that fought for the Union to elect a Representative.

This is a reassertion of that already shown to be incorrect. It ignores democratic votes and population North and omits the pregnant fact that the colored voters South both voted and were counted in making up results. If negroes are voters and entitled to representation, (and the republican party has made them so,) then they are as much entitled to be counted as are the minorities in any district in the Union. In every close contest since 1872 their votes have given the State of Pennsylvania to the republicans. They hold the balance of power there and invariably cast it against the democrats. If the Senator from Maine will have one result he must accept the other. The Senator says:

> The political power thus appropriated by southern democrats by reason of the negro population amounts to thirty-five Representatives in Congress. It is massed almost solidly and offsets the great State of New York; or Pennsylvania and New Jersey together; or the whole of New England; or Ohio and Indiana united; or the combined strength of Illinois, Minnesota, Kansas, California, Nevada, Nebraska, Colorado, and Oregon. The seizure of this power is wanton usurpation; it is flagrant outrage; it is violent perversion of the whole theory of republican government. It inures solely to the present advantage and yet, I believe, to the permanent dishonor of the democratic party. It is by reason of this trampling down of human rights, this ruthless seizure of unlawful power that the democratic party holds the popular branch of Congress to-day and will in less than ninety days have control of this body also, thus grasping the entire legislative department of the Government through the unlawful capture of the Southern States.

If it be "wanton usurpation and violent perversion of the whole theory of republican government," what shall we call the wholesale disfranchisement of the democratic masses north by skillful manipulation of political power? Indiana, with a democratic plurality of over 5,000 in 1876, sent to this Congress 9 republicans and but 4 democrats; 23,120 votes or 115,000 population could choose a republican to Congress, while it required 53,291 votes or 265,000 people to elect a democrat. The home of the Senator—New England with its six States—sends to this Congress 22 republicans and 6 democrats; 16,691 votes or 80,000 people can elect a republican member of Congress there, while it requires 49,321 votes or about 250,000 people to elect a democrat. To the Senate, New England sends 10 republican and 2 democratic Senators. Upon the basis of the vote of 1876 it requires 36,721 votes or 185,000 people to choose a republican Senator from New England, while 147,963 votes or 740,000 people are required to elect a democrat. The six great Middle States—New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa—contain 3,650,000 voters or about 16,000,000 of people, yet they have but 12 Senators as against an equal number in New England for 663,000 voters and about 3,300,000 people. These are the results of our political system, and there is just as much reason to find fault with it in New England as in the South. We must abide its inequalities and imperfections for the much greater good it contains. Sweeping charges or partisan comparisons can do no good and must do harm. The only important question is, have elections, North or South, been carried by fraud or violence? If they have, the incumbent holding by such a title should be ejected. The remedy is by contest under the statute. Orderly methods, sworn testimony, judicial inquiry, non-partisan judgment. These are the processes the people approve.

The invective hurled at the seizure of power by a solid South may be fitly answered by grouping the six great Middle States I have named and examining political results there. In this Congress, (and it is worse in the next) these States, upon a total vote of 1,842,212 republicans in 1876, have "seized" 75 Congressmen, while on a total vote of 1,804,341 the democracy get but 46. Upon a voting majority of 37,871 the republicans have "seized" 29 Congressmen. If we add to these States, New England, we find that 2,209,431 republican voters get 97 Congressmen, while 2,100,268 democratic voters get 52. In these twelve States 109,163 republican majority enables that party to seize 45 Congressmen. If we call a democratic white voter North the equal of a republican white or negro voter North, and as such entitled to equal political power, it appears that each 2,425 black or white republicans North have chosen one of these 45 republicans to Congress. Or, upon the same basis of equality, each 12,000 people who are represented by these voters have "seized" a republican Congressman. Or, if we generalize the whole we find that in these twelve States 22,777 black and white republican voters representing 113,885 people "seize" a Congressman, while it requires 46,672 democratic voters representing 233,360 people to elect one.

The fourteenth and fifteenth amendments were the crystallization of ultra-republican thought as to reconstruction. They did not seek to operate on individuals but upon States. There was no thought then of punishing organized communities for the misdeeds of a single locality, and the safeguard invoked was the only one that could be used without the destruction of our form of government. The plain terms of these amendments and the decisions of a republican Supreme Court thereon are now attacked because under them reconstruction proves to be the deadest kind of a dead failure. They will not reach and cover, and they never were intended to reach and cover, sporadic cases of fraud or violence. Such cases can only be met by the specific remedies given by law, and States cannot be punished by loss of representation because of alleged violence in one district in Louisiana and alleged frauds in two in South Carolina. It would be monstrous to punish a State either north or south by depriving it of representation because negroes failed to register themselves or to pay taxes, or because of irregularities in the election boards. Such is not the remedy for evils of this sort. If it were, we of Pennsylvania might be fearfully punished. In the recent election there fraud and bribery ran riot and thousands were disfranchised for non-payment of taxes. At least two contests are already inaugurated for seats in the House of Representatives, one of which is based upon the corrupt use of money, fraudulent and illegal votes, and the use of forged tax-receipts, while the other rests upon the charge of wholesale bribery and corruption and intimidation of white workingmen. The republicans, polling 289,000 votes upon the congressional issue against 288,000 democratic and 111,000 national votes, have "seized" eighteen out of the twenty-seven Congressmen returned to the new Congress. With an actual majority against them of 110,000 they grasp two-thirds of the congressional delegation. This is partly the result of an infamous apportionment, but it is much more the result of skillful manipulation of the political situation, of the unscrupulous use of enormous sums of money, and of the disfranchisement of masses of democrats for non-payment of taxes. No such political domination has ever existed anywhere as now dominates and controls the republican organization, and through it the political power of that great State. Bold, daring, and defiant, they tolerate no independent thought. They wield their organization as one man, and the end with them justifies the means. Sixteen thousand white and black republican voters in Pennsylvania are sufficient to elect a Congressman, but it requires 44,000 of their opponents to do so. If we carry it still further and look to the inner machinery of State politics it is worse. Forty-six senators and representatives in the Legislature are given to the city of Philadelphia. Upon the vote of 1876 there were 77,000 republicans and 62,000 democrats, yet in the recent election the republicans "seize" thirty-seven senators and members and the democrats get nine. It requires 6,888 democrats to elect a member of the Legislature in Philadelphia while 2,081 republicans are enough to elect one. This, too, is under the forms of law. But a much graver wrong was perpetrated at the same election there under the forms of law and through the use of money. There were in that city at least 20,000 voters of both political parties who had paid no taxes for two years. By our constitution no man can vote unless he has paid a tax within two years, and such payment must be made at least one month before the election. The republicans through their organization paid for thousands of these tax-receipts in bulk for distribution among their people, and when election day came they equipped every republican voter, white or black, who had not paid his taxes with one of them, which, by the law, was prima facie proof of payment. The democrats had no money for this purpose save in one congressional district, and by reason of their inability to do what the republicans had done it is believed that at least 8,000 white democratic voters were unable to vote. The republican managers gave the most stringent orders to their election officers to reject every vote not fully equipped with tax-receipts, and they placed at every poll deputy marshals of the United States, many of them of the most disreputable character, who were ordered to arrest every one who could not fully come up to their standard. So desperate is this management and so obedient to its orders is the Legislature of the State that the common-law right of the sheriff to appoint deputies was taken from him by express statute lest he, being a democrat, should aid in protecting the rights of white democrats.

Are not these denials and abridgment of the right to vote, so fully guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment, if the interpretation contended for by the Senator from Maine is correct? The negro voter was provided with a tax receipt paid for by the men who claim to own him North and South, and the white man, too poor to pay his taxes, was driven from the polls. Federal authority intrenched itself on the election ground in the room of the official whom common right and ancient custom places there, and the democratic party polled at that election but 53,000 votes against more than 62,000 polled in 1876. Would it be just to deprive Pennsylvania of her fair share of representation in Congress by reason of these deeds of unscrupulous political managers? The remedy for these wrongs must come through the wrath of an outraged people. It may come tardily, but it will come surely. Our wrongs come upon us in the full blaze of an intelligent northern sentiment. Their authors have enjoyed immunity so long that they think the people will always submit. Party rule and sectional hate are invoked to maintain and perpetuate the disgrace of an intellectual and proud people. This is the tocsin that is sounded by the terms of this resolution. This is the feast to which the northern people are invited. The condition of the South is infinitely better than it was five years ago. Fewer outrages, less of violence, more of normal and less of abnormal condition come to it year by year. The wrongs complained of by this resolution are located in the States in which carpet-bag rule lingered last, and we hear of none in the States longest under control of the white man. We must be content with our progress, until we can fully test the capacity of the negro for self-government. It will be time enough when he shall have utterly failed to come up to the standard of capacity to initiate the process foreshadowed by these resolutions.

The people North and South want rest from political and sectional agitation. Business relations, business interests, and business success can grow only when such rest is given them. Would you divide a solid South? Would you reconstruct your party there? Cease to persecute and begin to help them; appeal to administrative questions. Arouse the cupidity of their leaders by aiding them in material progress and internal development. Make it the interest of their people to act with you. Loose the bands of sectional prejudice that bind you, and aid by every constitutional power in reconstructing their highways and opening to your own people a market for their manufactures. May we not recognize the fact that political reconstruction has failed of its primary purpose, but that business reconstruction and material progress are the aims of the South and the interest of the North and that those whose principles and practice follow the path that leads to these will be esteemed the best friends of their whole country.

Mr. BLAINE. Before the Senator sits down I should like to ask him a single question; I did not want to interrupt him during his speech. If there is this great tyranny that has held Pennsylvania in its ruthless grasp and ruled that State so mercilessly in the interest of the republican party, how does the Senator, a leading democrat, happen to be on this floor?

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, there always comes an earthquake when the elements become convulsed. An earthquake sent me here; nothing else could in that State. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. And the Senator is still in a state of eruption. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator from Maine with his incisive questions and magnetic bearing prevails upon the Senate to sympathize with him; but I beg him to understand that while in that great State there may be two hundred thousand "stalwarts" who look to him for leadership, who sympathize with him, there are one hundred and fifty thousand men of his party who do not sympathize with the attacks upon the section with whom their business interests are connected, but who will follow him if he will point a path to restoration of business interests to a people suffering from deprivation of employment, starving for the means of livelihood, seeking a market for their manufactures; and just such men as the Senator from Maine these people look to for leadership in that path.

Mr. BLAINE. The only comment I desire to make on the extraordinary presentation the Senator from Pennsylvania made of his own State is that in the brief period I have been in Congress two democratic Senators have been sent from that State. The Senator himself is the second that has been here within the last eight or ten years, showing at all events that these earthquakes occur with some periodical regularity, and that the Pennsylvania democrats have at least had the opportunity to assert themselves in that respect. I rose for another topic. The Senator goes through long arrays of figures to show that taking the total democratic vote in Pennsylvania and the total republican vote, if one happens to get a few more Congressmen than the other that presents the same case I have shown respecting the South. Why, this Government in its organization in the House of Representatives is a Government of single districts, and the majority must control there.

The point I made against the South was not that anybody was outvoted; the natural issue and the inevitable result of republican contests is that one side must be outvoted. The point I made was that the minority were not permitted to vote. Does the Senator meet that point when he tells me there are twenty-two republican Representatives from New England and only six democratic? Does he mean to say that the twenty-two republican Representatives secure their election by depriving any man of his vote in those districts? When two men ride on horseback, we learn from Sancho Panza that one must sit behind; when two men run a race the faster will get ahead; when two men run for Congress one of the competitors will be chosen and the other left out; and the gentleman's logic might just as well point us to poor Mr. Tilden, all solitary and alone, when nine million of votes were very nearly divided between him and Mr. Hayes, and Mr. Hayes went off with the Presidency and Mr. Tilden did not have anything. That is the logic. You might apply it in infinite illustrations, and to infinite ridicule it would come in the end. It is sought to evade the point that I presented in that light. It is paltering in a double sense with a great truth and a great grievance to tell me that a minority of democrats under the single-district system in a State do not get as many Congressmen as a majority being republicans. It does not touch the case at all, Mr. President.

The Senator from Pennsylvania has simply ended in what he will pardon me for saying is a libel upon the good name of his own State in attempting to put her between myself and the accusations which I leveled against the southern elections. He can find no parallel there, and Pennsylvanians have greatly changed since I more intimately knew them, if white men in that State can be disfranchised and defrauded of their votes. More than that, I think the very system which the Senator arraigns, I think the very tax and registry laws of which he complains were the products of the constitutional convention which he was active in getting up, and which produced a constitution, not certainly under republican auspices, but now the organic law of that State. Under the operation of that constitution, under registry laws passed in pursuance of its provisions, the Senator has tried his fate, and while I will excuse his lamentations over a defeat, I certainly will not excuse his inculpations of those republicans of Pennsylvania who have as good records as any men in the country.

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator from Maine evaded the question utterly and absolutely in regard to the South when he massed the population of the North in the case of Iowa and Wisconsin and contrasted them with southern voters of the democratic side exclusively.

He did not count there the minority, while he did count the minorities in the North. In answer to his argument, I grouped voters and population, and I asserted what I reassert, that if the negroes are not to be counted in those districts South as having voted and been outvoted, then the democrats North are not to be counted as having voted and been out-voted when he comes to make comparisons with reference to the South.

Mr. BLAINE. Without any regard, I suppose, to the fact whether all the legal votes were cast and every man voted just exactly according to his desire! The Senator places that as a parallel; but the arraignment which I made—whether it be true or not is to be determined by the investigation—what I hold the Senator to in logic is that when I make this allegation and on that ask an investigation, he comes up and says, "Why, the democrats were defeated in Pennsylvania, and that is a parallel case! We have four hundred thousand democrats there, and the republicans have only four hundred and fifty thousand, and they have run off with three-fourths of the representation in Congress," not alleging at all but that the vote was honestly cast and that every man had the right to vote. Taking groups of States in the North, he says, "Why, in New England the representation is twenty-two to six." The Senator certainly will not expect the Senate to understand that he is serious in this, that he presents it as an answer to the arraignment I made. He cannot be serious, Mr. President, I am sure.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, I am about as serious as a Senator who deliberately on this floor attacks the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution and the decisions of the Supreme Court—a republican Supreme Court—made thereunder, which in their very terms deny the right to take representation from a State for the causes alleged in this resolution, and undertakes to initiate an investigation, which investigation must inevitably be fruitless and powerless to bring any such result. I am about as serious in my charges, surely, as he is in the initiation of such an investigation as this.

We of Pennsylvania have initiated contests alleging intimidation and fraud and bribery, and they will be settled before the tribunal created by law in the other House. The Senator, on the contrary, alleges intimidation and violence and fraud, and he uses a power that has no right, that can in no way apply a remedy, that is not given the authority in any form to correct the wrong. It is a brutum fulmen if it be done. We, on the contrary, whose voters were intimidated—I reassert what I have said—whose voters were bribed—and I reassert what I have said—whose voters were deprived of the right of suffrage by being driven away from the polls in masses because they had not paid their taxes when the republican organization had paid taxes for masses of black and white voters——

Mr. BLAINE. But did not the law require the tax to be paid?

Mr. WALLACE. Certainly. I am not complaining of the law; it is a safeguard. I am simply complaining of the use of money in the way in which it was used, the purchase of tax receipts in bulk to equip a black voter and to drive away a white voter from the polls in the city of Philadelphia. That is what I complain of, a denial and an abridgement of the right of suffrage, if you please, but not such a denial or such an abridgement of the right of suffrage as under either the Constitution or the laws can deprive the State of Pennsylvania of any single member in her representation in the other House.

And here I come back to the point to which I direct attention, that this proceeding is utterly fruitless; that it can result in no good; that the law as declared on the statute-book, in the Constitution, and by the Supreme Court, demonstrates that if all this were proven no result can come save political agitation, sectional turmoil, deprivation of employment in business; while if the other line, the line of appeal to law, to a contest under the power of the House, be taken, all the wrongs can be shown, everything can be made patent, and right and law can prevail. That is what this people want: orderly methods, appeals to law, sworn testimony, non-partisan judgment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ROLLINS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. If amended as proposed the last resolution will read:

That in prosecuting these inquiries the committee shall have the right, by itself or by any subcommittee, to send for persons and papers, to take testimony, to administer oaths, and to visit any portion of the country when such visit may in their judgment facilitate the object of the inquiry.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the passage of the resolutions as amended.

Mr. BLAINE called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask that the resolutions as amended be reported before the roll is called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions will be read as they now stand.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee, to consist of nine Senators, be appointed by the Chair to inquire and report to the Senate whether at the recent elections the constitutional rights of American citizens were violated in any of the States of the Union; whether the right of suffrage of citizens of the United States, or of any class of such citizens, was denied or abridged by the action of the election officers of any State or of the United States, in refusing to receive their votes, in failing to count them, or in receiving and counting fraudulent ballots in pursuance of a conspiracy to make the lawful votes of such citizens of none effect; and whether such citizens were prevented from exercising the elective franchise, or forced to use it against their wishes, by violence or threats, or hostile demonstrations of armed men or other organizations, or by any other unlawful means or practices. The committee shall also inquire whether any citizen of any State has been dismissed or threatened with dismissal from employment or deprivation of any right or privilege by reason of his vote or intention to vote at the recent elections, or has been otherwise interfered with.

And to inquire whether, in the year 1878, money was raised, by assessment or otherwise, upon Federal office-holders or employés for election purposes, and under what circumstances and by what means; and, if so, what amount was so raised and how the same was expended; and, further, whether such assessments were or not in violation of law.

And shall inquire into the action and conduct of United States supervisors of elections in the several States; and as to the number of marshals, deputy marshals, and others employed to take part in the conduct of the said elections; in what State or city appointed; the amount of money paid or promised to be paid to them, and how or by whom, and under what law authorized.

Resolved, That the committee be further instructed to inquire and report whether it is within the competency of Congress to provide by additional legislation for the more perfect security of the right of suffrage to citizens of the United States in all the States of the Union.

Resolved, That in prosecuting these inquiries the committee shall have the right, by itself or by any subcommittee, to send for persons and papers, to take testimony, to administer oaths, and to visit any portion of the country when such visit may in their judgment facilitate the object of the inquiry.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of making any speech, but inasmuch as I intend to vote against the passage of these resolutions I desire in a very few words to give my reasons for that course.

In the first place, I am unalterably opposed to these roving commissions. I am opposed to the system which has grown up since the war of appointing committees upon almost every conceivable subject and sending them at the expense of the country upon roving excursions to see what they can find out. I am opposed to the expense which has been entailed upon the country by the useless commissions that have been ordered by either the one or the other House of Congress within the last few years. We had committees to South Carolina, we had committees to Louisiana, we had committees to Florida anterior to the last presidential count, and when the evidence gathered by the gentlemen who had gone on these foraging excursions was printed at the public expense and was ready for examination by the parties who were supposed to have charge of the electoral count, we were informed that all of that testimony was aliunde. We had a committee sent to Mississippi, and after taking testimony for many days and weeks and gathering together two volumes as large as this [holding up a book] of Munchausen statements, they made their report to Congress, and I venture to affirm, that not ten men in or out of Congress have ever read fifty pages of those volumes. We have had our Potter committee and our Matthews committees, and various other committees. They have all been at work and the result is absolutely nothing but a large amount of expenditures to be paid out of the public Treasury. I am opposed to it, and I think the time has come when we should set our face against these wandering committees, some of whom I believe either singly or in twos have wandered with half a dozen stenographers over the Rocky Mountains during the last summer.

I am opposed to the expenditure of money for this purpose because I see no practical good to result from any report that the committee may make. This committee cannot report until near the close of the present session of Congress, and then the organization of the Senate will undergo such a change as that no partisan report will make a very strong and lasting impression upon a majority of the body. But I am opposed to it upon a higher ground than this, Mr. President. I am opposed to ex parte investigation in regard to those congressional elections held for members of the House in the Forty-sixth Congress. I am opposed to secret examinations which afterward are to see the light to reflect upon the characters either of contestants or of gentlemen who may hold credentials for the next House, throwing a cloud it may be over one side or the other in regard to their own contests, and in regard to the formation of that co-ordinate branch of the National Legislature. I am opposed to it because it is unfair and unjust in the Forty-fifth Congress to send a committee to gather ex parte testimony that will reflect upon a case which is to be judicially decided by the other House. Is it just to do so? Is it fair? Is it in the interest of a judicial determination of those questions when they arise in the Forty-sixth Congress in the other branch? I think not, Mr. President.

I, for one, therefore will not lend my aid to produce such an unjust result as that. I care not what may be thought of my judgment in voting against the resolutions. My friends from the South may object to my voting against them because it looks as if we shirked examination. I never shirk from any examination that is for the good of the country; but the waste of public money in an investigation that can produce no practical legislation I do oppose, no matter what may be the suspicions as to my motives.

Mr. President, I have heard of violence and intimidations, and the driving of men away from the polls before this charge coming from the Senator from Maine. Where was he in the old days when the know-nothings drove from the polls by thousands the citizens of foreign birth? Where was he?

Mr. BLAINE. Always against them.

Mr. WHYTE. Where was his voice against them? Point to his record against them. Let the Senator show me a speech delivered by him in the North against the know-nothings in 1845 in Pennsylvania, or in 1855 in my own State, when his own Representative from the State of Maine voted against turning a man out of Congress who was elected by the baldest and the basest frauds and intimidation that ever disgraced a free country. Where was he then? Why did he not stand up for the rights of the white men at that day? Oh, it was convenient to be silent in those days. No, Mr. President, I am opposed to this measure, because it will accomplish no good, and because it is unfair and unjust to those persons who will have contests in the next House of Representatives.

Mr. BLAINE. I want to answer the Senator from Maryland when he asks me where I was and why I did not lift my voice up when the know-nothings were ravaging Philadelphia in 1845 and in Baltimore afterward. I do not know the venerable years of my distinguished friend from Maryland, but at the time of the know-nothing excitement in Philadelphia, in 1844 and 1845, I was in a Pennsylvania college and rather a small boy. I do not remember that I did raise my voice very loudly at that time upon the subject at all, and I am afraid if I had it would not have reached the ears of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. WHYTE. I will ask the Senator from Maine if he raised it afterward, or was he in an academy ten years later, when he was twenty-five years old?

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to say to the honorable Senator that I never was a member of the know-nothing party; I never had anything to do with it; I never voted its ticket; I never had the remotest connection with it, and that is a great deal more than many leading democrats who are now pandering for the Irish Catholic vote in this country can say.

When the Senator tells me that on the question of expense he opposes these resolutions and that no good can come of them, I tell him that great good will come of them. If there is a misapprehension in the North on this question great good will result from removing it. If the offenses charged have been committed against free suffrage in the South, whether there be any legal or constitutional remedy or not, there will be that great remedy of public opinion and public exposure which neither the North nor the South nor any other community can long resist in the eye and the gaze of the world.

Senators who have spoken more directly for the South than the honorable Senator from Maryland have asked us to believe miracles. They have asked us to believe that in a night, in the twinkling of an eye, more quickly than Saul was converted on his way to Damascus, vast bodies of colored voters were turned right from the republican into the democratic fold. In what is called the "whip-lash" district in Mississippi, where they placed in those cotton counties in the delta all the negro population that they could crowd into one district, and four to one, I do not believe I overstate it, as compared with the white men, represented at the time by one of their own race, who, I do not hesitate to say, is a man of commanding ability considering his advantages and his birth, John R. Lynch, fitted to represent a constituency of white men, naturally and inevitably a favorite of his own color, at the very first election under this miraculous conversion, when the democracy got hold of the State, he was beaten overwhelmingly by General CHALMERS. Of course the negroes saw it in a moment; they had no doubt the moment General CHALMERS was put up that it was their duty to support him and to vote against Lynch. The honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] speaking for his State the other day, said that suffrage was absolutely free in that State and that it had never been interfered with from any quarter since the democratic party came into control. I am sure that Senator would not make an intentional misrepresentation, but I am equally sure that he cannot intend to convey to the Senate and to the people of the United States the impression that the republican portion of Mississippi admit the correctness of his statement. He surely does not mean to say that he speaks for the unanimous judgment of Mississippi when he makes the statement I have quoted. Is the Senator in his seat?

Mr. HAMLIN. He has his opinion and they have theirs.

Mr. BLAINE. Opposed to that assertion of the Senator from Mississippi, which he made of course in the utmost good faith, I read from an address of the republican State committee of Mississippi. It begins thus:

> In a State where civil government has been overthrown and whose power has been usurped by force and fraud and intimidation, where the usual means for canvassing for votes by arguments and appeal addressed to the judgment and patriotism of men have been abandoned, and where mob violence, unfair registration, and fraudulent counting of votes are notoriously relied upon to effectuate the unlawful rule of the political party now in power.

I am not responsible for that assertion; I do not know that it states the facts with accuracy; I do not know but that it may be an overstatement; but I quote it here to show that when the honorable Senator from Mississippi asserts that suffrage is as unobstructed and as free in Mississippi as elsewhere, his statement is not in harmony with the statements made by the opposing political party.

Now, if this debate is to close, I will add only a word. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] was greatly disturbed in his dreams apparently last night by the terrible results to flow from some sectional agitation. He wanted peace. I know a man always feels like having peace just after a pretty sound thrashing politically. I felt a little that way myself in September. The Senator from Pennsylvania feels that way to-day. He aches from a more recent and more intense experience than I had. But the Senator certainly does not speak the sentiments of his own State when, with all its mighty interests intrusted in part to his care, he confesses himself willing here to have an overrepresentation from a section that has always been hostile to the interests of Pennsylvania. He certainly is not expressing the feeling and the sentiment and the interest of his State by the position which he avows.

And a word to the South. Why is there no immigration South? Why is Texas, largely now in the control of white men from the North, alone of the Southern States filling up with immigration—alone, I say, of all the Southern States, if you except the invalid emigration to Florida? Why is this general feeling? Do not southern Senators themselves, holding the interests of their section in their keeping, see that something serious is the matter? Virginia is a far more inviting field for settlement than those remote northwest regions to which immigration is flocking by the million. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] has given a vivid description of the great resources and attractions of his own State. He doubtless paints them truly. Why does it not fill up? The feeling among immigrants from the North coming into the Southern country is that they are not welcome and not invited to equality in those States. I think the statistical fact will bear me out in the assertion that in the past five years there have more Northern men come out of the South than have gone into it, excepting the States of Florida and Texas. There have more northern men, I say, come out of the South than have gone into it. I am no enemy of the South. I wish its prosperity. I have never given an illiberal vote respecting it; I have never given one stingy or ungenerous vote affecting its interests; but it is southern men themselves who build a wall of fire around that country and dedicate it to a lack of prosperity, if I may use a mild and somewhat awkward phrase. Think of these things! The idea that the northern people, interlaced and interbound as they are with every interest of the whole country, can look with unconcern upon the prosperity or lack of prosperity of the South is to challenge their sagacity as business men and their interests as American citizens. There is no such thing as an antagonism based on anything else than what is universally understood to be an injustice to the northern man and to the colored man who wants to vote with him.

There is much I might say in reply to the honorable Senator from North Carolina, but I will not detain the Senate. I remember that in his own State many years ago there occurred an incident that has given us a word familiar in our American vocabulary. A representative was making a loud harangue in the house of delegates, but was not disturbed by the impatience or inattention of his fellow members, because he was talking for "Buncombe." I think the Senator from North Carolina was probably addressing an assemblage soon to meet at Raleigh rather than the Senate that is before him to-day.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I really admire the manner in which the distinguished Senator from Maine preaches; but I am very much afraid that he is like the direction-post—he points the way but rarely goes himself. While he is teaching our southern brethren how to behave themselves and to make their homes happy and their States prosperous, why does he not get up a grand colonization society of the colored people and take them, like they took the Swedish colonists, to Maine, and try to build up a John Lynch to come here from Maine to represent one of his districts in Congress? Are there no John Lynches north of Mason and Dixon's line? Is it the case that the colored man at the South only is brilliant, but when he gets to the North the cold of that region freezes his brain? Have all these three or four hundred thousand negroes lived in the Northern States so long with their lights hid under a bushel that the benevolent character of the Senator from Maine could not find one of them to be sent here to Congress to represent a northern district? Ah! no, Mr. President, I am afraid there is a lack of sincerity in that preaching. I never had much faith in these political Moodys. I would rather believe in their practices than in their professions.

We know perfectly well, no intelligent man does not know it, that the negro man has voted wherever his interest carries him to vote. After the war, when the Freedman's Bureau and their emissaries were scattered through the South, the negroes, willing or unwilling, after being collected in lodges at night, were led up to the polls to vote a ballot for the republican party, without even knowing what they were casting their ballots for. I have not forgotten Captain Hunnicutt. That was the euphonious name that the leader of the negroes had in Virginia just after the war. He carried them up in platoons and voted them. I well remember a circumstance that occurred on one of the plantations when a boy named John returned from an election. He was asked, "John, have you voted?" "Voted; I–I think I have." "Well, whom did you vote for?" He said, "No matter who I voted for, I voted the right ticket." "Well, John, if you do not know whom you voted for, how do you know you voted the right ticket?" "Oh, I know I voted the right ticket; why, you couldn't vote no other ticket; I seen it tried." [Laughter.] If it has turned out in the South that in some districts there are Captain Hunnicutts on the other side, it is only what happens too often, like curses, and curses are said to be like chickens, they come home to roost. Captain Hunnicutt, the emissary of the republican party at the South, for all I know, because I know nothing about it, has probably found that he has taught other men to play the Hunnicutt game down there which he had learned in his home in the North.

My friend from Maine said that he was a boy in 1845. I doubt it. I doubt whether he ever was a boy in any political sense of the word. If he was, certainly in politics he is the old boy now. [Laughter.] The fact is, Mr. President, we had peace and good order in this body before he was transplanted from the other side of the Capitol, [laughter;] no place is big enough for him and anybody else, and now he reminds me of the story of a colored man who belonged to a prominent old gentleman, whose son, Mr. President, was a foreign minister for many years and a very distinguished gentleman, and who was a good deal in politics as a whig like my friend from Maine upon the other side. He had a very exemplary colored man who waited upon him, and he had a habit at a dinner party of asking that man what he thought of things. Upon one occasion he said, "Jake, what have you got to say to-day?" "Well," said he, "Massa Kit, I had a dream last night." "What was it?" "Well," said he, "I dreamed I was in the lower regions, and I had got asleep for about two minutes, and I heard a tremendous hullabulloo. I thought I would look around and see what it was, and directly I saw Satan coming out of the place with a pitchfork in his hands and hollering. I asked him what was the matter. 'Well,' said he, 'the fact is this place isn't big enough for Kit Hughes and me.'" [Laughter.] I do not think my friend from Maine ought to throw these fire-brands here in the Senate Chamber. This is a conservative body. We have been in the habit of dealing with the errings and the vagaries of the other House in a serious and conservative way, and we do not want to have these shindies in the Senate which my friend from Maine is eternally getting up. I hope he will stop it; and if he desires to keep the country in a ferment that he will return to the other branch of Congress, which a former Senator has recently described as a sort of bear garden. Of course I do not say anything of that sort; it would be unparliamentary.

Mr. President, I wish to add only that another reason why I shall not vote for these resolutions is that I want peace and quietude. I want to see Congress pass the appropriation bills that are now pending and those to come before us, and dispose of any legislation that is absolutely essential to the prosperity and happiness of the country; and let us postpone these political quarrels until the next presidential election, when we shall have a chance at the Senator from Maine himself. I hope for the sake of peace and good order that we shall dismiss political bickerings for the rest of this session of Congress.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I want to reply to simply one remark made by the Senator from Maine a moment ago. What I wish to say is that of all the curses that have beset the southern people in the Southern States since the war, I believe that agitations like that now going on in the Senate Chamber are the greatest. I believe the South would be happy, would be filled up with capital and immigration but for the fact that capital and immigration have been frightened away by slanders like those that are proclaimed not only from this point but from a thousand other points against the southern people. Notwithstanding these misrepresentations and slanders, in many of the Southern States immense amounts of capital are there profitably invested. I know many northern citizens who have gone into my own State, and many of them are among the best there. They are hopeful; they are prosperous; they encourage others to go there. I wish this agitation would cease, that the vast volume of immigration that goes to the West would go South; and the day is not distant when it will do so. But I must say that I trust the Senate will vote down the resolution, and frown on everybody who engages in agitation.

Mr. BLAINE. Before the Senator sits down will he answer me how many northern men there are in North Carolina now as compared with ten years ago?

Mr. MERRIMON. That I cannot undertake to state.

Mr. RANSOM. Will my colleague pardon me for one second. I cannot state to the Senator from Maine specifically or exactly how many there are but I can assure him of the fact that the number of northern men who have settled in North Carolina in the last ten years is very large, and I think I can very truly, I know I can most sincerely say that as a general rule they are doing very well.

Let me be a little more particular. There is a large settlement, rather what we in North Carolina would call a large settlement, at Elizabeth City. I think a friend of the Senator from Maine is there, the chief, if I may say so, of that settlement. They are doing uncommonly well. They are engaged in manufactures, slightly in commerce, and in agriculture. On the Roanoke River, at a place known as Jamestown, nearer to myself than to my colleague, there is another large settlement engaged in taking timber from the swamps. They have built a handsome village and are projecting a railroad out into one of the timber regions of North Carolina. At Henderson, in Granville County, half way between my colleague and myself, on the Raleigh and Gaston Railroad, and near Ridgeway, there is another large settlement of Northern people doing very well. At Greensborough, in North Carolina, and in the neighborhood of Guilford, there is another large settlement of northern people. I see from the papers that a large colony have recently purchased land in the mountains of North Carolina and propose to make that their home. It is so all over the State. They had been following the lines of the rivers and along the lines of the railroads, and now they are going out into the mountain region of North Carolina off the lines of railroads.

I beg leave to say furthermore to the Senator from Maine and to the country that those people are satisfied with their own homes, and invariably, when they have come as good men, regardless of political associations or what we may consider partisan prejudices, they have been taken by us by the hand. We regard them as our friends and fellow-citizens, and they regard us as theirs. Marriages have taken place between them and natives of the State; partnerships have occurred between them. The face of the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] now reminds me that I introduced but a few days ago to his colleague a distinguished gentleman from his own State with whom I had the honor to be a partner in a small transaction, with a great deal of hope, I fear not too much reality, in North Carolina. I regret that I cannot state the exact number of such cases, but that would be impossible to arrive at. I wish the Senator from Maine could see them. If I had it in my power to-day I do not know any argument that I could present to the country that would be so strong as what I believe would be the unanimous statement of the northern settlers in North Carolina in favor of our institutions there, if I may call them so, of our habits, of the law-abiding disposition of our people, and of our truth and fidelity to the nation.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, my convictions have changed in regard to my duty in voting for these resolutions since they were introduced into the Senate and since they have been amended on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, and I believe also of the Senator from Maine. When the resolutions were brought into the Senate they were based upon the predicate that there was some necessity for additional legislation in order to improve the laws of the United States so as more effectually to protect the ballot in many of the States of the Union. The framer of the resolutions addressed them to the Judiciary Committee, and in the sequel of the resolutions he provided that a certain investigation should be made, which would result ultimately in the preparation of such additional laws as the Judiciary Committee might see proper to frame with a view of securing fair elections in the United States. That proposition addressed itself to the judgment of the Senate as one worthy in itself of consideration. Although it was believed on this side of the Chamber and by the country at large that that proposition was merely a piece of the machinery of a political adventure, still Senators on this side of the Chamber did not consider that they would be justified in the eyes of the country, particularly those Senators who are from the Southern States, in refusing to have any investigation made which might lead to the establishment of the proposition that there was needed any additional law or laws for the protection of the ballot in this country. But after that proposition had been discussed a question arose as to the striking out of "the Committee on the Judiciary" and inserting in place of it "a select committee of nine Senators." The obvious purpose of this change was to relieve the Judiciary Committee of an investigation which every one saw apparent upon the face of the entire debate was utterly unnecessary, that there was in fact no demand in this country for additional legislation upon this subject, and so far was the Judiciary Committee itself impressed with this want of necessity that an eminent gentleman who belongs to that committee rose and begged the Senate to excuse that committee from the discharge of this great and important duty, urging as the ground for it that that committee was already smothered with labors and that there was apparently no necessity for imposing upon that committee this additional burden of work.

If it was obvious to the members of the Judiciary Committee, including I believe the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] that there is nothing to result from these resolutions in the shape of legislation that is worthy of the consideration of the country, why is there any further necessity of pressing this demand upon the attention of the Senate and of the whole country? Has it not become obvious that the whole pretended purpose of these resolutions when they were originally introduced has failed, has been exploded, has gone into thin air? What we are doing now is simply the prosecution of some political adventure here for the purpose of aiding the one side or the other in the future political controversies in this land. Not only has the resolution been thus changed so as to take from it every quality and every pretense of its being an honest investigation to improve the law of the land, but the friends of the resolution have imposed upon it a very peculiar complexion in the fact that they have denied to the minority of the Senate the right to have the investigation of this question made openly before the world. We have the singular phenomenon presented to the country that the statutes are to be improved; that they are to be amended so that honest elections can be had throughout the United States, and that that amendment must come through the sanction or at least under the investigation of the Judiciary Committee; and yet after we have progressed to that extent, gentlemen turn around and strike out "the Judiciary Committee," thus proving by their motion that there was no honest intent to improve the laws, but that the purpose of the movement was simply to aggravate political acrimony in this land.

When the honorable Senator from New York arose for the purpose of offering an amendment whereby a select committee should be employed for this purpose instead of the Judiciary Committee, he declined the chairmanship of that committee, and I suppose now, as a matter of courtesy, as a matter of parliamentary order, the honorable Senator from Maine who offered the resolutions will necessarily be the chairman of the select committee to conduct this investigation.

Mr. BLAINE. He has already declined that publicly.

Mr. MORGAN. But perhaps the Senate will not excuse the Senator from Maine. I shall not vote to excuse him, for I want to hold him up to his work. I want to see him work out this exploit that he has brought before the country, and to father that which belongs to nobody else.

If we should choose to put the honorable Senator from Maine there notwithstanding his declination, and if it is a duty to the country so very important as he seems to think it is, why does he decline so important a duty? If he has become so much more impressed than all the rest of the world with the necessity of this investigation, this scouring of the country for the purpose of hunting up elements of wrath to throw into the political caldron, why does he decline to step forward and take the management of the committee? No, sir, he ought to be the chairman of this committee, and no Senator here, it seems to me, with proper self-respect would usurp the dignities of the high position which belongs so eminently to the Senator from Maine. When he gets his committee organized, and is prepared to fulminate upon the next presidential election, he will close the doors for convenience, and subcommittees of the minority working under him will have no opportunity to compel the majority to open the doors and disclose to the world what is going on inside of their secret chambers.

When, therefore, the whole nature of the resolutions was changed and when it was changed by the transfer of this judicial question to a mere political committee selected as it doubtless will be with reference to the recent rule of seven to eight, I felt myself absolved from the necessity of voting for them and even from that stress of situation which seemed at the moment of time to compel me to yield my judgment, which is in opposition to the resolutions, to the unfortunate fact that I did not feel that I had actual liberty of action, being a southern man and from the land that was denounced. But when you add to this the fact that those who are conducting this adventure choose to close the doors of the committee against the light, except that part of it which they might prefer to throw upon the world, then I feel that I am not only exonerated from this pressure but that it is my duty to vote, as I shall do, against the entire resolutions. In doing that I doubt not that I shall separate myself from many of my southern friends.

The great question upon which we are now about to institute an investigation is, how has the South become solid? That seems to be the trouble on the part of the Senator from Maine. He seems to be incapable of appreciating the fact that the South may have become solid, as he calls it, in other words, democratic, through honest changes of political affiliation and by means of honest influences. It is useless for me to volunteer testimony in advance of an investigation. I do not choose to assume the rôle of the Senator from Maine and to undertake to force my statements on the country as the very truth, but I prefer to wait, inasmuch as we will have an investigation and will see how it turns out, if the facts shall ever come to light, as to what was the real cause of this loss of republican power in the Southern States. I believe that I understand the subject; and while I will not venture to cover the whole ground of debate by personal statements of my own experiences or of the facts that have come within the range of my own observation, I think I can state certain principles which will be recognized the world over by whoever understands anything about the negro population as furnishing the true key for the solution of this question that has been so vehemently urged upon the country.

First of all, the republican party asserted the capacity of negroes to become intelligent voting citizens of the United States of America, and conferred upon them this power against the opinion not only of the South but against the opinion of such men as Senator Morton and others that the period had not arrived in the progress of their condition when it was prudent to confer upon them these powers. In the face of the convictions of thousands upon thousands of the most enlightened men in the United States and of the greatest statesmen who have lived in this country during many years this measure was forced upon the country, and the negro was taken and almost by compulsion was made an American citizen having the right to vote.

It is not to be denied that at the time that was done there was great question and serious apprehension that this thing would result in evil to the country, but the South did not set itself to work out an unfavorable result. The South, on the contrary, set itself to work in a spirit of duty to the American Government and to the American people, and tried to furnish to the negroes through their educational establishments and in every way that they could an honest and a fair opportunity to qualify themselves for these high duties of citizenship.

I deny that we have obstructed the negro in reference to his education, moral or religious or political. I deny that we have imposed upon him through any of our laws any burden which repressed his labor or took from him the advantages of his honest toil. I deny—and these proofs abound through the statute-books of the South and in its constitutions—that in any respect we have either legislated against or worked against the progress of the negro in trying to qualify himself for the high duties of American citizenship. On the contrary, he, remembering the affection, the feeling of kindness and of love even that oftentimes prevailed between him and his former master, sought his protection, sought his encouragement and his support, and scarcely ever did he fail to receive it.

It was the duty of the republican party after they had made these provisions of law for the enfranchisement of the negro, and it was by the way a contemporaneous act with the disfranchisement of the white man, to have sent their very best men into the South, such men as the Senator from Maine and others, for the purpose of going upon the hustings and in the lecture-room and elsewhere in that country to improve the negroes in regard to their education and especially in regard to their duty toward the American Government. But who came down there? Have we ever had the honor of seeing the Senator from Maine in the South? Has any other of these gentlemen who concern themselves so deeply now, who feel such a wonderful interest in the condition of the negro, come down there for the purpose of lecturing to them or discussing with us before them the principles of American government and the duties and the rights of American citizenship? No, sir, they have carefully abstained from going to that country. They were not afraid to go; by no means were they afraid to go. They have carefully abstained from going to that country, and in the place of these missionary efforts of their own they have permitted to be cast upon the South the most disreputable, dishonest, and unworthy class of men that ever were spewed out from the northern or any other communities. These men whom they sent to the South, backed by armies, to take charge of us and to compel obedience to their will in reference to all things that pertained to political action have gone there and maintained themselves as long as the negroes would tolerate them in the absolute control and mastery of the conscience of every negro in that land; but their crimes blackened the whole history of this country. The dockets of the United States courts and the State courts, the records of Congress, the traditional remembrances of thousands and tens of thousands of men, have brought to the attention of the country the dark and dismal record of their crimes, and it has become so conspicuous that the whole people have revolted at it, and the northern republicans have in this Senate and elsewhere withdrawn all moral support from this gang of carpet-baggers. After you withdrew your moral support, after you were forced to do it for the very sake of decency itself, now you complain that the next power that stands by the side of the negro, the men with whom the negro had some kind of reconciliation if not entire reconciliation, asserts itself over the minds of these affectionate and good-hearted people. Sir, the man who does not understand the negro supposes that he is always in antagonism to the democratic party and the men who comprise that party, while the truth is that every natural instinct, every emotion of his heart and all his education bind him closer to the bosom of the man with whom he was raised and whose slave he had formerly been than to any stranger.

That is the situation exactly. When, therefore, you withdrew your support from the carpet-baggers, the carpet-baggers having nothing in themselves that commended them to the approbation or acceptance of any people in the world, then, of course, the next power intervened, and instead of attacking the negro with force and violence and bloodshed, it exerted over him the persuasive influences of affection and of convincing argument. The truth is, however gentlemen may be indisposed to believe it, that these men vote with us because they are convinced that we are honest men, and desire to protect them in their rights. But the Senator from Maine, as I understand the theory of his subject, the gravamen of his complaint, is disappointed in this fact, and would now undertake by some congressional regulation to control that which always has been beyond the reach of law. For when you made the negro an American citizen you gave to him the same right of independence of thought and action that you possess; and when you have conferred these upon him you must assume, in justice to us, that they have been freely exercised, until you can show that his inclinations to think and act for himself have been obstructed by actual violence which he has not been able to overcome. Then, as the argument stands, can the Senate say that any changes in their views in regard to who are their proper representatives in the Congress of the United States are not the result of the operation of the weight of argument and conviction upon the minds of these people? Are they insensible to argument and have they no intelligent ideas of duty? People in this country vote sometimes very extraordinarily and they undergo very rapid changes, something like that which the Senator from Maine feels so much surprised at when he characterizes it as a conversion during a single night. I can cite the Senator to very many instances of the same kind that have occurred in the United States, and perhaps one of the most conspicuous instances is a recent event in his own State. Who converted the people of Maine in a single night to the fiat money greenback candidate, who was elected over an honest republican and a very distinguished gentleman of the State of Maine? What influences were brought to bear? None other than those that are brought to bear upon the negro in the South, a conviction impressed on his mind as it was impressed on the minds of the people of Maine, that that was his course of duty in order to best subserve his own interests and to protect his own rights. Similar changes to this have taken place in other States also, and I will refer to just a few of them.

In the State of Illinois the last majority for General Grant was 53,948, and the last majority for the republicans when Mr. Hayes was a candidate for the Presidency was 1,971. What influence was it that changed 50,000 votes in that brief period of time? And yet, there was almost as miraculous a change in the intervening period of the congressional elections. In the State of Pennsylvania the last majority for General Grant was 135,918 standing against the majority for Mr. Hayes of 9,375. These are but samples of what took place throughout the whole Northwest. Are we to impute to the entire people of the Northern States en masse that they are coerced, or that they are corrupt, and not law-abiding because they choose to change their views in regard to political men and measures very suddenly, as they often have done? Why do we not impute fraud against these people in the Northern States when they make these sudden changes? With equal justice we might resort to that argument against the people of the North except that the Senator is impressed with the conviction that having freed the negro, and having made him an enfranchised American citizen, he has a property in his right to vote, and that he requires some new and peculiar guardianship that does not belong to the balance of mankind to enable him to vote the proper ticket.

Now, when you have decided that he shall be equal before the law of all other citizens, we expect that the law shall apply by the same rule of equality to him and to everybody else; and there is no necessity, nor is there any constitutional authority, for the enactment of a new and different species of statutes for the preservation of his rights from those that obtain and have obtained heretofore and have reasonably secured honest elections throughout the United States. When you make a freeman of a negro, let him be a freeman. You have freed his body; now free his conscience. You have given him liberty of action and liberty to work for himself without the constraint of a master. Now, let him have the liberty also to think for himself and vote for himself without the compulsion of some foreign agency introduced into the laws by an act of Congress. You have got your United States marshals; you have got your supervisors of elections; you have got all this new and costly system against which there is no demur and no obstruction in the South. Yet all this coercive power and all of these agencies, it seems, are insufficient to keep the negro from enjoying the rights of a freeman and cannot prevent him from voting according to his own judgment and his own conscience. You want something more effectual.

Mr. President, it is not my duty here, nor is it my disposition, nor is it in my judgment the disposition of any Senator from the South or indeed of any man from the South to interfere with the local affairs of the people in other parts of the United States. Whatever else may be said of us, it can truly be said of us in the light of history that we have not attempted to interfere with the management of the affairs of the American States so as to control them contrary to their own views and their own judgment. The State of Massachusetts, for instance, has a law, as I understand, which prohibits a man from voting until he has paid his poll-tax. It has two other requirements as I believe in its statutes, one that a man shall be able to read a designated passage in a book, and the other that he shall be able to write, before he can be permitted to register his name as a voter. The democratic voters of the South consider such doctrine as this altogether at variance with the theories of their great party and of the Constitution, as they have been handed down to us traditionally for a great many years; but because these doctrines and these practices in that State seem to be undemocratic and are not gratifying to us when we compare them with our principles of government, yet we have never thought it right for us to intrude into these matters. We have thought it would be an act of mere impertinence to make such an intrusion as that.

So in regard to the neighboring State of New Hampshire which I believe still has in its constitution, in some measure at least, that restriction which has been always considered odious because it stood opposed to the freedom of conscience in religious matters, which excluded Catholics from holding office. We have never thought it was necessary in the South that we should wage a crusade against New Hampshire to get her to change her institutions in this particular. We have thought she was quite able to take care of herself. The men of renown and greatness whom she has sent to the Senate and has elsewhere contributed to the service of the United States, many of whom have been welcomed in the Southern States as if they had been born on the soil—these great men we thought were quite competent to take care of these matters and quite honest enough to be intrusted with their disposal.

We will not object, however, to congressional committees coming to our midst. We see northern people in the South every day of the year; and while we are here debating on this proposition as to whether certain classes of people in the South are secure in the enjoyment of their constitutional rights, tens of thousands, yes hundreds of thousands of men daily issue forth from the large cities of the North, the Northeast, and the Northwest who visit every city, every village, every hamlet throughout our entire country trading their wares, their goods, and their merchandise with our people. Do not these men freely visit the South? Do they go there with arms to protect their persons and property against violence or outrage? Are they not received in every house in the South with hospitality? Are they not regarded as the friends of the country? Yes, sir, and they drive such immense traffic with our people as that if we chose to close our doors against their access for even six months to come we could bankrupt the chief commercial and manufacturing establishments in the North that deal with the South. But, sir, we are glad to see these heralds of peace, these missionaries of commerce and justice. We welcome them to our midst day by day; and while Senators on this floor are complaining of the southern people there are men from the northern and northwestern cities traversing the entire length and breadth of the land collecting all the spare money we have to spend in exchange for goods. I desire to see this thing go on and be encouraged. I desire that nothing shall occur which will obstruct this system of traffic between the South and the North, this continually increasing intercourse which brings with itself hearty good-will and prosperity to both the great sections of this land, and I so deeply regret that I cannot express it that anything has been attempted here that has a tendency to obstruct or prevent a further growth of this kindly feeling between these sections.

The Senator from Maine asked a question which grated upon my ear. He asked a question which I think had better been pretermitted for this moment, to say the least. He asked the question why there was no emigration to the South. Ah, Mr. President! a great deal hangs upon that question, and more hangs upon the mistaken view that the Senator from Maine has of it perhaps than he now supposes. There is emigration to the South, a large emigration to the South from the Northwest, if not from the Northeast. Texas is filling up with population now to such an extent that whereas she has but six members on the floor of the House of Representatives to-day, she claims eighteen under the next apportionment, and the power will be transferred from his little neck of land, running up to the Saint Lawrence down into the great dominion of Texas, for he will lose strength while Texas gains strength under the operation of the laws of the United States and its Constitution. There is vast emigration to the South, and there would be vastly more if the gentlemen who have the charge of politics in the Northern States would speak of us and act toward us as if we were really citizens of the United States entitled to the respect that that honored name brings to men and to communities.

But, sir, emigration has gone to Alabama. There is one county which was created by the Legislature at the last biennial session called the county of Cullman, named after a distinguished German who visited the plains which lie on the top of the Sand Mountain, as we call it, and seeing there a land that the native people of the country had not inhabited he became possessed with the idea that it had a good foundation of soil, and was capable of large improvement. Thereupon he got a very large concession of land amounting to more than one hundred thousand acres, and he organized in 1872 a little colony upon it, starting out with about fifty families, and now they have risen to that extent that they are entitled to representation in the Legislature of Alabama. They have a separate county to themselves called Cullman; they have some of the most flourishing communities, not merely one but several locations of colonies, to be found anywhere in the Southern States. And so it is in other parts of the State, in the great iron and coal regions of the South millions of capital are going from Pennsylvania and other places farther East seeking investment in these large properties and building up an immense production of iron very much to our gratification. We are delighted with it.

But there is one region of country to which no man emigrates, and that is what is called the "black belt," that is where the negro population is very dense. Why do they not go there? We try to persuade them to go there. Lands that in that belt sold from sixty to one hundred dollars an acre in gold before the war can now be bought for from six to ten dollars an acre. We invite them to go. We use every manner of persuasion and argumentation and inducement that we know how to use, in order to get people to go there. This vast number of people who seem to have a disposition to migrate from the North and Northwest are invited, but they do not go, and why do they not go? It is because they are afraid of the negro. They will not associate with him; they will not harmonize with him; they will not live in the neighborhood with him. You cannot induce them to go there and establish plantations at all. No doubt if they remain in the Northern States, and especially if they are politicians, they would not at that distance spurn the negro, they would be entirely willing to use the negro for their own advantage; but like the Senator from Maine they will not go down there to talk to the negro or to look at him, much less to live with him and vote with him.

Now, Mr. President, whatever the cause may be, a man who has not been raised in a negro community, who from his childhood has not been taught to value the real excellence of some of the qualities possessed by that race of men, can never be persuaded to take up his habitation among them. He always turns from them. He goes away from them instead of to them. You have placed this legacy of burdensome tutorship in our hands, and you will not come there to associate with us in our efforts to provide for these people. You will not come there to occupy this country that holds out such great inducements to emigration and to investment. You are afraid of the negro. You will do nothing but send political speeches among us. You will not come there to speak to them; and yet you quarrel with us because after you have given us the control of them we will not teach them to vote the republican ticket. That is the whole of it. If you make us their educators in politics, as we have been their educators in everything, we inform you that we shall educate them according to our own political faith and try to get them to support the democratic ticket if we can do so. There is no doubt about that; and as long as you stay away and make speeches at us and speeches at them and send your investigating committees about to harrow the country you may expect that the democrats of the South will use all persuasive and honest influences for the purpose of getting the negroes to vote with them.

Mr. President, I regret, in my heart I regret, that the necessity has ever existed in this country for what is termed "a solid South." The solidification of the South took place like the solidification that occurs when a bar of steel heated in the furnace is put under the hammer of the blacksmith. Heat and friction continually applied to us from the outside forced us to be solid, and, thank God, when you forced solidity on us you put an edge to us and spring to us beside. I regret, however, that the circumstances ever existed which have led to this condition of affairs, not because we have done any injustice in reference to the negro, but because it is a continual subject of harassment and debate between the different former divisions of the United States into North and South. That is my cause of regret; and if Senators from the Northern States would withhold their abuse of us, if they would withhold their denunciation, if they would permit us to work out the problem of our civilization according to the Constitution and laws of the United States, then should you see the day when opinion in the South would be, as it is to-day indeed, as free as it is in any other part of the United States on every question concerning the welfare of the people.

And that, Mr. President, is the real course to take with us, and I regret that Senators on that side cannot see it, because, if I know what is in my nature and my heart, I wish to join with them in every effort to blot out forever the lines of division that have heretofore existed between us. Gentlemen proclaim that they will have a solid North to meet a solid South. We are met with that threat continually, and yet we have done nothing to solidify the Northern States that I know of. But let me admonish gentlemen who thus clamor against us that their demand for a solid North, that being now the majority section, means a demand for conquest and supremacy in the North, and it equally means vassalage in the South. And if the issue comes to that, the one section of this country to be dominant and the other to be vassal, then we must look to ourselves to see how far we can avoid or prevent the evil consequences of a result like that. I expect, sir, that we shall have to submit to it as long as the North shall solidify itself in antagonism to southern interests, until the scepter of power changes hands. I expect that we shall have quietly to work and war against it, not with arms, but by persuasion, and perhaps even by supplication, until we can get those of the North who intend thus to dominate us to relax their strong and tyrannical purposes. But I will admonish Senators that the permanent vassalage of the South is a physical impossibility under the Constitution of the United States and the laws thereof, for you must remember that we have the privilege, even without the consent of Congress enacted into a law—a privilege secured to us by a treaty with the United States Government—to put at least eight more Senators into this body from the single Commonwealth of Texas.

I call the attention of statesmen to this for the purpose of convincing them that this vassalage which they propose to inflict upon us and this domination that they think they can secure through this means will prove to be visionary, an ignis fatuus. When such a policy is once established it is a question within our control who shall be the vassal. Whatever compulsion may be charged against us as having been employed against the negro of the South in reference to his political action, there is one thing I have never yet heard charged against the South, and that is that we compel the negro to labor more hours of the day than he ought to labor or wants to labor or compel him to work for A when he prefers to work for B, or that we compel him to relinquish the ownership of land in order to become a tenant, or that we by any sort of compulsion, moral or physical, have controlled his material destiny in any respect whatever. And yet, in the face of all that is charged against us in regard to the negro, we see that he is left so free to work the land, to improve his own condition, to exercise all the privileges of American citizenship, that he produces this year more than five million bales of cotton and adds more to the wealth of this country and to its commerce than twice the number of men in any other part of the United States of America engaged in agricultural pursuits. When this fact is contrasted with the complaints that are brought here against the condition of the negro and the whites in the South, as to the alleged disorganization of that country and its want of respect for the law, the present crop of more than five million bales of cotton is an answer that at least will strike the mind of every practical and sensible man in the United States as being entirely overwhelming against the accusations that are made against us.

Mr. President, a great deal has been said, and very much more I suppose has been thought, upon the idea that the people of the South hold themselves in really personal antagonism to the negro. Sir, that is not true. The fact to which I have just adverted proves that it is not the truth. It shows that the people of the South work in harmony in the great duties of life. When the negro came to this country from his African home he spoke his African gibberish and worshiped the most obscene idols; and if you were to import negroes from there to-day you would find men of just such condition and quality. The explorations which have been recently made in Africa by the great American and English travelers have revealed the fact that the negro in his native home is in the same state he was when your fathers brought him to this country and sold him to ours, and in just the same condition. Who, then, has been his educator? Who made him the peer of the greatest citizen of the Northern States? Who fitted him for American citizenship? Who built him up in his moral character, in his manhood, in his education, in his æsthetic tastes, and in every other respect, so that he has become, all of a sudden, not only a factor in our political government and the equal of the best in the land, but the pet of all the distinguished Senators on the other side of the House who are there now and who have been there heretofore for many years? Who were the educators of the negroes of the South? Did your missionaries go there to educate them? No. You said it would be labor thrown away. We have given the negro a vast amount of education, and you admit that by the very demand you make now that he shall have an exalted position in society as well as in politics. But I notice that these demands are made on one section of the country only, while they are neglected elsewhere. There is a large number of negroes throughout the North, intelligent men. Some of them escaped by the underground railroad years ago and received the benefits of northern education while their brethren were still held in slavery. And yet, if I am informed correctly, there is not one of them upon the bench, perhaps there is not one of them in a State Legislature; I know there are none of them in Congress; and upon a notable occasion when I rose here to vote for confirming the nomination of one for a distinguished office under the Government of the United States, I felt that I was frowned upon by the other side.

Now, Mr. President, I will vote against these resolutions for the reason I have stated, because I believe a vote to sustain them would now commit me to a proposition to lend the power of the Senate to a mere political investigation, whereas when they were first offered they at least conveyed the idea that we could fairly make a judicial inquiry in regard to the laws of the land, and if any defect was found in them that we should be able to supply that defect. The political agencies of the Government of the United States have been actively intermeddling in my own State, and there the result has been that the democrats have been repressed to the number of six thousand in one congressional district alone, and doubtless many have been kept from going to the ballot-box by the threats of the Attorney-General of the United States, issued in the form of a proclamation. The President of the United States and his Cabinet, coinciding with a large portion of the republican party in the Northern States in their advocacy of what is called sound money, in which advocacy very many of the southern democrats honestly sympathized, made an extensive canvass in the North; and while they were doing that, the Attorney-General was endeavoring by proclamations sent out in advance of the election to hinder the people from going to the polls. He was endeavoring to threaten them to such a degree as that they would be afraid to go to the ballot-box, and the result was that a gentleman was elected who was a greenback democrat, by the united support of the republicans of that district, and I believe he is now here to claim his reward in some little appointments to office, which are paid as cash on the spot. When you attempt congressional interference by the passage of these resolutions, and when you come to investigate the question of interference either by the people or the Government, I desire to give notice to the gentlemen who may compose the committee that the investigation is not going to stop just where the gentleman who framed and offered the resolutions may desire it to stop. No, sir; I give notice now that when the investigation is opened it shall, so far as I am able to have any influence in it at all, be a full and fair investigation, extending throughout the United States wherever there is any real cause to be investigated. It must go to Pennsylvania and investigate what has been done there. It must go also to Massachusetts and investigate what is charged to have been done there. Equally it must go to New York, and equally it must go to Colorado and Nevada, where just as flagrant frauds as ever were perpetrated against the ballot in the world were perpetrated during the last election.

I beg pardon, Mr. President, of the Senate for having indulged so long in these remarks, and I assure Senators on the other side that in what I have said I have not been controlled by anything but an honest desire to have this measure put upon its true merits and to give the reasons why I shall not be able to support it.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I desire to say in reply to the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] with reference to frauds in Colorado, that no democrat, high or low in Colorado, dares to charge frauds upon the republican party in that State. It is well understood in that country that we have had a fair election. The republican party put forth their candidate; the democrats nominated the most influential man in that State, a man whom they nominated with the declaration that he could put up and would put up more money to carry the election than any republican or all the republicans could put up in the State. He did do that. More money was expended by the democratic party in Colorado during the last election than has ever been spent by any or all the political parties in fifteen years before; and if the Senator from Alabama or Senators from any other portion of the country would like to include Colorado in this investigation, I should be most happy to have it put in and I will prove my statement before any respectable committee.

Mr. BLAINE. It is in there.

Mr. TELLER. If it is in there, the gentleman shall have every opportunity so far as we are concerned to prove whether there were frauds in Colorado or not, and if I do not make good what I say, that the democratic party put up and expended their money more liberally, more extensively than it had ever been expended by all political parties, then I am greatly mistaken.

I am asked by a Senator whose money they expended. I do not know. It is charged publicly in that country that they seized one railroad corporation and depleted its treasury in behalf of the democratic candidate for governor. We are prepared for any investigation if anybody sees fit to charge frauds in Colorado upon the republican party here or anywhere else.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the Senate ready for the question on the resolution, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered?

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to announce that my colleage [Mr. JOHNSTON] is detained from his seat by indisposition. If present he would vote "yea."

Mr. MORRILL. My colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] on all political questions. They are both absent.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] but I understand the pair only to extend to the question whether the committee should be required to hold public examinations or whether they should be left to the discretion of the committee. That question having been disposed of, as I understood the Senator, he was in favor of the resolutions. I therefore consider myself at liberty to vote "yea," unless the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON,] who was the referee in the matter, shall otherwise explain.

Mr. GORDON. I think the Senator can vote without any difficulty.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I then vote "yea."

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator from Vermont stated that his colleague and the Senator from Ohio were paired upon political questions. Mr. THURMAN, if he were here, would vote "yea," as well as the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON] was paired on political questions with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. DORSEY,] but I did not announce the pair because I did not regard this question as political, and consequently excused him from indisposition.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I was paired yesterday with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. CONOVER.] I have not seen him in the Chamber to-day, and I do not know but that he may think the pair extends to to-day. I therefore shall not vote.

Mr. GROVER, (who had voted in the affirmative.) I forgot that I was paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.] I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BUTLER. I am paired with the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT,] but his friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has absolved me from that pair, and therefore I think I shall let my vote remain.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from California and the Senator from South Carolina would undoubtedly vote on the same side if the Senator from California were here.

The result of the roll-call was announced—yeas 56, nays 6; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 942) to authorize the Secretary of War to construct a bridge across the Potomac River at or near the Three Sisters Islands; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5683) to amend an act approved June 20, 1878, and to fix the rate of interest on bonds authorized by said act to be issued by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. No. 1460) to authorize the issue of certain duplicate registered bonds for the benefit of the Manhattan Savings Institution; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5485) for the relief of Andrew Muckle.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in answer to a Senate resolution of December 5, 1878, information concerning postal and commercial intercourse between the United States and South American countries; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. MORRILL. I call up the resolution for adjournment over the holidays. I think it ought to be acted on.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont calls up the resolution from the House of Representatives which is a privileged question. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That when the House adjourns on Friday, the 20th instant, it stand adjourned until Monday, January 6, A. D. 1879.

Mr. MORRILL. I yield for a moment to the Senator from Louisiana.

JURORS' OATH.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, and I request the attention of the Senator from Michigan, chairman of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY.] Quite a number of citizens of the State of Louisiana have been arrested for an alleged violation of the laws of the United States at the last election. There was a bill passed by the House of Representatives repealing the test oath which was required to be taken by petit and grand jurors in the United States courts. That bill was referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws on December 6, 1877. That test-oath law under which these parties in Louisiana are now to be tried is a law which was repealed in 1872; these parties are to be tried under a law of the United States which has been in fact repealed, but which was inserted in the Revised Statutes without any authority whatsoever and is now technically, though improperly, a statute of the United States. The provision of that law is that whereas a citizen of Louisiana is a fit person to be a United States Senator, is a fit person to be even a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, or even the President of the United States, yet that person in law is an infamous person and cannot sit upon a jury in a United States court——

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President——

Mr. EUSTIS. The Senator does not understand me as making the slightest reflection on the committee.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I wish to make an inquiry. When was that bill to which the Senator alludes referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws? On what day?

Mr. EUSTIS. It was referred on the 6th of December, 1877.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. My impression is, so far as relates to that particular bill, that it was afterward—I cannot now give the history of it—referred to the Judiciary Committee and has been before the Judiciary Committee. I cannot at this moment state what has been the result.

Mr. EUSTIS. I understand that that is an error. I call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the fact that the records show that the bill is before his committee. I do not intend in the slightest degree of course to reflect upon any member of that committee, still less upon its distinguished chairman. I merely want to call the attention of the Senator, as chairman, and of the members of that committee, to the very urgent importance of an immediate passage, if possible, of the bill, as I do not think there can be any objection in this body to the repeal of that statute.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. If the statute be repealed it is undoubtedly true, as the Senator has remarked, that the revision ought to be so amended as to show it; but I wish to state here that I do not think that, according to my recollection, such a bill ever came into that committee since I have been chairman of the committee, and I think I was chairman of it at that time. I do not think the bill ever reached the committee.

Mr. EUSTIS. I am merely guided by the record, which says: "In the Senate of the United States, December 6, 1877. Bill H. R. 1890, read twice, and referred to the Committee on Revision of the Laws."

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to make a suggestion to him? I have introduced a bill to correct the evils which he complains of and to repeal those sections of the Revised Statutes relative to jurors. It is now on the table of the Senate, subject to be called up, and I hope to be able to call it up to-morrow morning and ask the Senate to pass it. If that can be done it will relieve the difficulty. I give notice now that I will to-morrow morning call up that bill.

Mr. EUSTIS. I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky if it would not be better for the Senate to take up the House bill and pass it.

Mr. BECK. It would, and I have no idea that will be done, and I fear it will remain without action. The House will concur in the bill to which I have alluded, if we pass it.

Mr. MORRILL. I supposed the Senator from Louisiana wanted only a minute's explanation. I think the adjournment ought to be acted on while the Senate is full.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to the House concurrent resolution in reference to adjournment?

Mr. MORRILL. I offer the following amendment——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will first be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That when the House adjourns on Friday, the 20th instant, it stand adjourned until Monday, January 6, A. D. 1879.

Mr. MORRILL. It will be observed that the resolution that comes from the House merely provides for the adjournment of that branch of Congress, making no provision for any adjournment on the part of the Senate. It is also proposed that the House shall adjourn for an unusually long period. Heretofore, in years past it was only customary to adjourn for the day or at most for a little more than a week, but we have reached the habit of adjourning for about a fortnight, and now this resolution comes with a proposition to adjourn for seventeen days. I have thought, therefore, it was better that we should diminish the number of days for adjournment to a fortnight and that we include the Senate; and my amendment is to include the Senate as well as the House in the adjournment, and to make the adjournment for a fortnight instead of seventeen days.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Vermont to withdraw his amendment so that we can take the sense of the Senate upon the two questions separately.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator can move to amend the amendment and insert the proposition of the House if he chooses.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Iowa can ask for a division of the question.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that he can make a motion to amend the original proposition which would take precedence of the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL. My motion is to amend the original proposition.

Mr. HOAR. I move to perfect the House resolution by inserting instead of the words "the House" the words "two Houses;" and instead of "it," later in the resolution, the word "they." I suppose that will take precedence of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, as it affects the original proposition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will, and the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WITHERS. Let it be reported now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That when the two Houses adjourn on Friday, the 20th instant, they stand adjourned until Monday, January 6, A. D. 1879.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] proposes an amendment which will now be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "that" and insert:

When the Senate and House adjourn on Monday the 23d instant, they shall stand adjourned until Friday, January 4, A. D. 1879.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is not debatable.

Mr. HAMLIN. Not debatable!

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Not debatable.

Mr. HAMLIN. Why not?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Simply because the rules preclude debate upon it.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Chair be kind enough to state the rule?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will have the rule read. The Secretary will report the forty-third rule.

The Secretary read as follows:

43. When a question is pending, no motion shall be received but—
To adjourn,
To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn, it shall be to a day certain,
To take a recess,
To proceed to the consideration of executive business,
To lay on the table,
To postpone indefinitely,
To postpone to a day certain,
To commit,
To amend;
which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they stand arranged; and the motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to executive business, and to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I think in regard to a concurrent resolution of the two branches of Congress, it has never been held that under the rule which has just been read it is not a matter to be amended and debated like other legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that it may be amended on motion.

Mr. HAMLIN. And debated? That does not come, in my judgment, within the rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has no doubt of the construction of the rule.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the Chair so rules I shall not appeal, but I am quite confident——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is quite sure that the Senate will listen to the Senator from Maine. He construes the rule, however, as he understands it. The Senate will listen to the Senator from Maine. [A pause.] Will the Senate agree to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont?

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to the resolution of the House as it has been amended?

Mr. McCREERY. I move to amend by striking out "Friday the 20th instant" and the words "Monday, January 6," and inserting "Thursday the 19th instant" and "Tuesday, the 7th of January."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to the resolution as amended?

Mr. BLAINE. I think the last motion ought to have been divided. Monday is not a good day for the reassembling of Congress. It ought to be Tuesday. Monday is the worse day in the week for the reassembling of Congress after a recess.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator move to amend in that respect?

Mr. BLAINE. I move to amend by substituting Tuesday, the 7th of January, for Monday, the 6th.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 28, noes 28.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The vote of the Senate being equally divided, the Chair votes in the affirmative. As thus amended, will the Senate agree to the resolution of the House of Representatives?

The resolution, as amended, was concurred in.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After sixteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and forty-four minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 17, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

The SPEAKER. Hon. John D. Long, the lieutenant-governer-elect of the State of Massachusetts, is present, and the Chair desires to invite him to the privileges of the floor. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

IMPROVEMENT OF THAMES RIVER, CONNECTICUT.

Mr. WAIT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5684) for continuing the improvements on the river Thames, Connecticut; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF STONINGTON HARBOR, CONNECTICUT.

Mr. WAIT also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5685) for continuing the improvement of Stonington Harbor, Connecticut; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

RICHARD F. LOPER.

Mr. WAIT also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5686) for the relief of Richard F. Loper; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. ROMERO, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to print in the RECORD as part of the debates some remarks which he had prepared on Senate bill No. 376, to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories. [See Appendix.]

JULIUS BAUMER.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a message from the President of the United States in answer to resolution of the House of the 5th instant, transmitting report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, in reference to the expulsion from the whole territory of the German Empire of Julius Baumer, a naturalized citizen of the United States and a resident of the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, while on a visit to his aged parents at Münster, Westphalia, in the kingdom of Prussia, by the Prussian government, in violation of the treaty of May 1, 1828; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with permission to that committee to order the printing if they found it necessary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. WOOD. I hope the gentleman will yield to allow me to make a request from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HALE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. WOOD. I am directed by the Committee of Ways and Means to ask that a portion of Thursday next be set apart for the purpose of acting on some bills of importance already reported to the House, and others which will be reported if we shall get the opportunity to do so. Some of those measures are of great public interest, and will be unanimously adopted no doubt when brought before the House. All we want is the opportunity of two or three hours on Thursday next to present this business for the consideration of the House.

Mr. HALE. Is that Thursday of this week? If so, I do not think the gentleman should press it, when there are pending two or three appropriation bills, which must be put through this week, and also when the Geneva award distribution bill is pending before the House and must be first disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Geneva award, the Chair is informed, will occupy to-day after the disposal of the post-office deficiency appropriation bill, and to-morrow the Indian appropriation bill will be taken up, and how long that will take it is impossible now to tell.

Mr. HALE. The remark of the Chair bears out what I have already stated, that the business for this week is already too crowded to permit the granting of the request made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that Thursday will be occupied in part by action on the Geneva-award bill. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] having that bill in charge proposes to call the previous question, so as to bring the House to a vote in the early part of Thursday. The gentleman from New York may have an opportunity after the disposition of the Geneva-award bill.

Mr. WOOD. I ask, then, that the Committee of Ways and Means be granted the opportunity I seek after the disposition of the Geneva-award bill on Thursday next.

Mr. HALE. That I will not object to.

Mr. WOOD. I hope there will be no objection, because of the great importance of the subjects to be considered.

Mr. ATKINS. If it interferes with the appropriation bills I certainly must object.

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine demands the regular order.

Mr. BRIGHT. The gentleman from Maine yields to me to introduce a bill for reference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will advise the gentleman from Maine that he cannot at the same time demand the regular order and yield, because that interferes with the committals of the Chair for recognition.

Mr. HALE. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Tennessee if I could, but under the statement of the Chair I cannot do so.

Mr. GARFIELD. I insist on the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] who moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the deficiency post-office appropriation bill. But the Chair is just this instant advised that the bill has not come back from the Printing Office.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask that by unanimous consent we proceed to the consideration of the measure, although the printed bill is not here.

The SPEAKER. The original bill is not here. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Georgia later in the day when the bill has come up. The regular order now is the consideration of the Geneva-award bill; and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] is recognized for the fifteen minutes remaining of the hour of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STENGER.]

GENEVA AWARD.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4553) to provide for the further distribution of the moneys received under the Geneva award.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I can hardly hope to say, in the very few moments I am permitted by the favor of the member from Pennsylvania [Mr. STENGER] to occupy the attention of the House, anything new on this momentous question. The millions of dollars—about $10,000,000—involved in the issue of this bill demands of each member his best judgment. The wide difference among the distinguished members of the Judiciary Committee at least warns those of us who are not able to say we have spent years in investigating the questions involved that there is room for honest differences of opinion. Principles, however, do not change on account of the importance or insignificance of cases. As to the details of the bills of the majority and minority of the Committee on the Judiciary I am forbidden for want of time to speak. The bill of the majority of the committee proposes to have the claims to the fund of all parties adjudicated by the Court of Claims, with a right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States; the bill of the minority proposes to revive the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, and submit the claims of some of the claimants to the fund to it, to the exclusion of other of the claimants, and to make the decision of such commissioners final. Stripped of all details and circumlocution, the two propositions coming from the Judiciary Committee may be fairly stated thus:

A majority of the committee, as set forth in the bill reported by the chairman, [Mr. KNOTT,] favors the granting to all claimants to any portion of the Geneva-award fund or the interest thereon remaining undistributed a day in court, with a limitation of one year in which to file the claims, with the right of appeal given to each claimant or the United States to the Supreme Court of the United States, these claims to be, in the same manner, prosecuted as other claims in the Court of Claims. All persons are to be deemed claimants and have judgments rendered in their favor who were actual sufferers "by the violation of the laws of neutrality by Great Britain" for such amount as in the opinion of the court they shall severally be "justly entitled to recover under said treaty and award according to the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations, without regard to any rule or principle of allowance, exclusion, inclusion, or distribution heretofore adopted by Congress," or by the Alabama claims commissioners; all payments hitherto made to be deducted from the judgments to be rendered by said court. The judgments so rendered are to be paid ratably if in the aggregate they exceed the total amount of the said fund and the interest thereon still under the control of the United States; all expenses incident to the hearing of said claims to be first paid out of said moneys; and if any part of the same shall still remain it shall be subject to the further action of Congress.

A minority of the committee (as set forth in the bill reported by the member from Ohio, [Mr. MCMAHON,] favors the recreation of a court of commissioners of three persons, whose judgments shall be final, before whom certain designated claimants shall be granted the right to go, within six months from the organization of such court, and prove their claims, without regard to the "principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations," as the court might find and apply them. In its consideration of the designated claims referred to in the bill of the minority of the committee, the court will have no power in its rule of allowance to exclude or include any claim save as the proposed law directs.

No general principle is to be given to such court to guide it. The fiat of the law, arbitrarily applied, is to be the only guide of the court in making its final decrees. There is to be an utter disregard of the rights of all claimants whose claims were adjudged to be valid within the three rules laid down in article 6 of the treaty of Washington, (May 8, 1871,) as interpreted by the distinguished members of the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva. By section 4 of the bill of the minority the claims suffered to be presented to such court of commissioners are divided into three classes, namely:

First. Claims described in section 11 of the act of 1874 relating to the distribution of this fund so far as they are not adjudicated, and, to quote from the bill—

> Claims directly resulting from damage done on the high seas by confederate cruisers during the late rebellion, including vessels and cargoes attacked and taken on the high seas or pursued by them therefrom, although the loss or damage occurred within four miles of the shore.
> Also:
> In cases of the loss of a whaling-vessel and outfit the court shall allow, in addition to the compensation provided for in the said original act, the sum of 10 per cent. in lieu of freight upon the value of said vessel and outfit as found by said court.
> And upon all judgments heretofore rendered under said act for the loss of a whaling-vessel and outfit there shall be allowed the said sum of 10 per cent. upon the awards as made by the court, with 6 per cent. interest thereon from the day from which said original award bore interest until the date of payment.

Second. Claims for additional interest upon judgments of the court of Alabama claims awarded under the act named, on which the new court is to award 2 per cent. additional interest from the time interest was allowed to the time of payment.

Third—

> The third class shall be for claims for the payment of premiums for war risks, whether paid to the corporations, agents, or individuals after the sailing of any confederate cruiser, in determining which it shall be the duty of the court to deduct any sum in any way received by or paid to the claimant in diminution of the amount paid for any such premium, so that the actual loss only shall be allowed.

Judgments on claims of the first class are to be first paid out of the fund; judgments on claims of the second class are next to be paid in full, or pro rata if the remaining fund is insufficient; and so of the claims of the third class.

Let us analyze these classes of claims a little.

The first class includes claims and pretended claims resting on various grounds.

Section 11 of the original act provided for the adjustment of claims for direct losses caused by the inculpated cruisers Alabama and Florida and their tenders, and all claims admissible under that act directly resulting from damage caused by the inculpated cruiser Shenandoah after her departure from Melbourne, (February 18, 1865.) These claims all ought to agree should be paid, but they are to be coupled in the same class with all claims for direct losses on the high seas during the rebellion caused by exculpated confederate cruisers, of which there were a large number, and without regard to time or circumstances of the loss. The bill under the first classification directs the court to award 10 per cent. upon the value of whaling-vessels and outfit, as found by the old court, in lieu of freights; and the further sum of 10 per cent. upon prior awards for value of whaling-vessels and outfits, with 6 per cent. interest from the date the original award bore interest until payment. The second classification seems to be only for the purpose of fixing 6 per cent. as the uniform rate of interest to be allowed.

The third is for "premiums for war risks," or rather indirect losses, excluded from consideration wholly by the Geneva tribunal, and withdrawn by the United States without reservation from the "case" before that tribunal.

Nothing illustrates more sharply the absolute inequity and injustice of this classification for payment than the fact that nothing is to be included for national losses, damages, or injuries caused by a prolongation of the war, by a transfer of commerce to the British flag on account of the action of the confederate cruisers, and for expenses in the pursuit of such cruisers, &c.; also excluded and withdrawn from the case of the United States before the Geneva tribunal. These national claims, and all private claims for indirect losses, including war premiums, were unanimously rejected by the judgment of that tribunal before the final submission of the case. They should all stand or fall together.

The tribunal, through its president, Count Sclopis, (June 19, 1872,) in deciding against such claims, said:

The arbitrators think it right to state that, after the most careful perusal of all that has been urged on the part of the Government of the United States in respect of these claims, they have arrived, individually and collectively, at the conclusion that the claims do not constitute, upon the principles of international law applicable to such cases, good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations, and should upon such principles be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making its award, even if there were no disagreement between the governments as to the competency of the tribunal to decide thereon.

The arbitrators being governed by the three rules provided for their guidance in article 6 of said treaty, and as also set forth in said article, "by such principles of international law not inconsistent therewith as the arbitrators shall determine to have been applicable to the case," in their final award also found as follows:

So far as it relates to the particulars of indemnity claimed by the United States, the costs of pursuit of the confederate cruisers are not, in the judgment of the tribunal, properly distinguishable from the general expenses of the war carried on by the United States. The tribunal is therefore of the opinion, by a majority of 3 to 2 votes, that there is no ground for awarding to the United States any sum by way of indemnity under this head.

And whereas prospective earnings cannot properly be made the subject of compensation, inasmuch as they depend in their nature upon future and uncertain contingencies.

The tribunal is unanimously of opinion that there is no ground for awarding to the United States any sum by way of indemnity under this head. And whereas, in order to arrive at an equitable compensation for the damages which have been sustained, it is necessary to set aside all double claims for the same losses, and all claims for "gross freights" so far as they exceed "net freights;" and whereas it is just and reasonable to allow interest at a reasonable rate; and whereas, in accordance with the spirit and letter of the treaty of Washington, it is preferable to adopt the form of adjudication of a sum in gross, rather than to refer the subject of compensation for further discussion and deliberation to a board of assessors, as provided by article 10 of the said treaty.

The tribunal, making use of the authority conferred upon it by article 7 of the said treaty, by a majority of 4 voices to 1, awards to the United States the sum of $15,500,000 in gold as the indemnity to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for the satisfaction of all the claims referred to the consideration of the tribunal, conformably to the provisions contained in article 7 of the aforesaid treaty; and in accordance with the terms of article 11 of the said treaty, the tribunal declares that all the claims referred to in the treaty as submitted to the tribunal are hereby fully, perfectly, and finally settled.

Furthermore, it is declared that each and every one of the said claims, whether the same may or may not have been presented to the notice of, made, preferred, or laid before the tribunal, shall henceforth be considered and treated as finally settled, barred, and inadmissible.

The finding and award of the august tribunal is thus set forth at length to enable members to comprehend the completeness with which the arbitrators disposed of possible questions coming within the scope of the treaty of Washington.

On what principles of law and justice the private claims rejected by the tribunal are to be admitted and the claim for national losses (also rejected) is to be excluded we are not advised. In the designation of "claims on the part of the United States" national and individual claims were confounded and were all comprehended together, without making separate mention of individual claims. The General Government, for itself and its citizens, as it was bound by usage and national honor, pressed a general claim for all injuries, damages, and losses against Great Britain. The result was an award in gross of a large sum of money, based on valid claims, found to be such by the rules and principles of international law which a great and wise tribunal found should govern it.

It is wholly immaterial whether it was, as is claimed by some members, the paramount purpose of the United States to have certain great principles of international law settled authoritatively or not by the treaty of Washington and the tribunal that met thereunder at Geneva. It is unquestionably true that so far as the proper disposition of the money award goes it should at least be first applied to the payment of the claims of parties for such losses as were, under the rules which governed the arbitrators, considered in making the award.

There are those who pretend to believe that the award made of $15,500,000 was made to the United States on account of all claims presented by the United States of every kind, name, and nature, and that the arbitrators, in assuming, as they had a right to do under article 7 of the treaty, to make an award in gross to the United States, utterly disregarded the rules which they held applied to claims and included damages for all losses sustained by the United States and all its citizens by reason of exculpated and inculpated cruisers during the whole war.

This is so violent a conclusion that it is hard to conceive how it can be calmly entertained. To reach such a conclusion is to impeach the integrity of all the distinguished arbitrators save Sir Alexander Cockburn, the arbitrator on the part of Great Britain. It is, in the absence of conclusive proof, a most violent assumption to say that these arbitrators laid down with great care rules for the exclusion and inclusion of claims presented, and then in making up an award in gross willfully violated and disregarded them. Had the rules established been allowed to be applied by a board of assessors under article 10 of said treaty, it is conceded that only such claims as would have been valid under them would have been allowed. In a certain sense it is undoubtedly true, as shown by the award already quoted and as required by article 11 of said treaty, that all claims against Great Britain were finally settled by the award. That article is as follows:

The high contracting parties engage to consider the result of the proceedings of the tribunal of arbitration of the board of assessors, should such board be appointed, as a full, perfect, and final settlement of all the claims hereinbefore referred to; and further engage that every such claim, whether the same may or may not have been presented to the notice of, made, perfected, or laid before the tribunal or board, shall, from and after the conclusion of the proceedings of the tribunal or board, be considered and treated as finally settled, barred, and henceforth inadmissible.

It will be observed that if the tribunal had left to a board of assessors to make up an award on each valid claim in detail, all other claims would still have been finally settled. But it does not follow that an award in gross was to be held to be paid on account of invalid and unpresented claims, as well as on account of recognized and valid ones. The reasoning in favor of such a view may possibly be called specious, yet it may lead to absurdity, injustice, and wrong. If only one valid claim had been presented and considered in making up the award together with a hundred wholly groundless ones, the holder of the valid claim, if this view is to prevail, would have to share the sum awarded with the holders of such other claims, even though they were grossly fraudulent. The statement of such a proposition is its own refutation.

The bill, Mr. Speaker, of the minority of the committee has no better or broader foundation than can rest upon such an inequitable view. The proposition is captivating, that those who lost their vessels and cargoes on the high seas by all the confederate cruisers, and all those who had to pay war premiums by reason of such cruisers, should be reimbursed, whether the loss resulted or payments were made by reason of exculpated or inculpated confederate cruisers. But it is unsound. It is only because Great Britain was held liable according to international law for the payment of certain private claims for direct losses that any of the claims can be paid at all. It follows irresistably that only such claims as formed the basis of the award against Great Britain should be paid.

Losses of any kind occasioned on the high seas by confederate cruisers put afloat through no fault of Great Britain stand on the same footing as all other losses or damages by the enemy whether on sea or on land. Untold millions of dollars' worth of property have been destroyed by the enemy on land belonging to loyal parties North and South that have as much right in law and equity to the Geneva award fund as the holders of rejected or unpresented "Alabama claims." No person, or party, I believe, has yet proposed to pay claims for losses occasioned by the acts of the enemy on land. They are included under the head of "ravages of war," the payment of which is always refused. There were also billions upon billions of dollars' worth of property destroyed by the Union Army which it is not pretended can be paid even where the parties are of undoubted loyalty and resided in the North. The sympathetic argument is not broad enough. The cloth will not cover all who are naked. It is specially pressed that those who paid war premiums to insurance companies should be reimbursed. It may be that many of them were reimbursed and more too by the war freights collected of the shipper, and hence suffered no loss.

The bill of the minority of the committee is on its face a confession of the inequity of many of the claims included in its provisions. All the claimants to this fund either stand abreast in point of right, or they have no proper standing at all. If the fund was awarded for all the claimants regardless of the merits of their claims, then all should be paid in full or suffer a reduction ratably. The bill itself discriminates not only against the second and third classes named but may operate, yes, its friends admit it will operate, to exclude certain claimants who would be "justly entitled to recover under said treaty and award according to the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations." By the bill of the majority, all persons and corporations claiming on account of losses during the late war a share in the Geneva award fund, no matter how or when such losses occurred, are permitted to have their claims tested finally by the highest judicial tribunal in our Republic, and by the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations. This privilege the bill of the minority denies them. It has been said on this floor that to permit this to be done would give to certain insurance companies a portion, if not all, of the fund. This, as a member of this House, I need not decide; nor have I decided it. The highest court in the land is eminently qualified to determine, judicially, who is in equity and justice entitled to receive the fund.

If those who argue so strenuously that the award was made to reimburse all claimants for losses, whether their claims were considered by the tribunal good, bad, or fraudulent, then the court may under the bill of the majority of the committee be bound to include and pay them.

If the award was made to pay all claims, why not use the fund to pay all of them? The bill of the minority refuses to do this, and excludes absolutely the claims of parties known to have been regarded by the tribunal as valid.

It is a suspicious circumstance that great confidence is expressed in certain things connected with this grave question, and yet there is such bitter opposition made to permitting the highest judicial tribunal in the land to determine them.

Legislative adjudication is almost invariably unwise where great principles of law and equity are to be applied among a large number of parties, and it is always a doubtful expedient. The insurance companies, who it is said may have some claims in equity and justice, are so reviled and abused as to put some men in awe and cause them to hesitate to do their duty even here.

It has been vehemently asserted that these companies will, under the bill of the majority, get the fund "under the doctrine of subrogation by technical rules of the law," or that by invoking the application of such doctrine they will be admitted to receive a portion of the fund. Is the invocation of the doctrine of subrogation (or substitution) an appeal to the law's technicalities? If so, then the terms of the bill of the majority will rule out these companies. Technical rules are set aside by such bill. But subrogation, if not a head in equity, is a rule of equity, and it has no connection with the law's arbitrary and technical rules. Equity may be invoked where the law fails to do justice; it commences where the law leaves off. Subrogation as a rule in equity, where only it has application, had its origin in and was transferred from the Roman or civil law, and was founded, as says Judge Story, "in principles of natural justice." Thus it is made clear that the bill of the minority of the committee proposes to override the principles of natural justice in the distribution of this large sum of money.

The assaults upon the insurance companies must not be mistaken for sound logic or argument in favor of a vicious proposition sought to be applied in support of pretended claims of parties who may have no higher rights, though sufferers, than thousands of others who were crushed under the car of Juggernaut, drawn along by the cruelty and fanaticism of war. The eagerness and zeal of a lawyer, sometimes, on account of the extreme exigency of his case, leads him to assail the real or supposed faults of his adversary in person, in lieu of the ability to successfully assail the grounds of his adversary's case. Though some of us may be lawyers, we are called on to do our duty as legislators. Let us try to perform that duty impartially. I am led to the conclusion I have arrived at by my conviction of what is right in the light of what I deem to be the natural justice and equity of the whole question.

In conclusion, let me say again that the distribution of this fund, it being the fruits of a treaty between this and a foreign government, comes strictly within the judicial power of the United States, vested under the Constitution in the Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. (Constitution, section 1, article 3.) This judicial power extends to all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution, the laws of the United States and all treaties made under their authority. (Constitution, section 2, article 3.) Shall Congress, as is intended by the proposition of the minority of the Judiciary Committee of this House, usurp to itself that power, or shall we relegate the whole question from Congress and send it for decision where under the Constitution it appropriately belongs, laying down no principles for the guidance of the court save those founded on the broad and comprehensive basis—justice, equity, and the law of nations?

Mr. CONGER was recognized, and yielded to Mr. HUMPHREY.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. Speaker, in considering this question briefly, I desire to call the attention of the House to the point out of which this case has arisen. Under the first administration of President Washington the government of England called upon this Government to provide against foreign enlistments. This Government promptly provided that no armed vessels should be equipped on our shores and be sent forth to prey upon the property of a nation which we were at peace with. The act was promptly passed. It was amended by an act of 1818, first session, chapter 88. The English government, as a matter of comity and in fulfillment of its promise, passed an act, an exact transcript of the act passed by our Government before the close of the last century.

Now, sir, we had our foreign-enlistment act in the wars of 1792 and 1798. We had it in the war of 1857. In the war of England with Brazil we enforced it promptly; and in the Crimean war when the English government gave notice to this Government that a merchantman was being fitted out as a vessel of war for Russia in New York, this Government on that notice alone arrested that vessel: and when soon after it was notified by the English minister that they were mistaken, this Government paid the owners of that ship $25,000 as damages. And when the war opened in the late rebellion and we called upon the English government to give to us the benefits of her foreign-enlistment act, she turned round and said to America, "We have framed and passed this foreign-enlistment act for our benefit and not for the benefit of another nation." We gave them notice, we gave them proof in the case of the Alabama, in the case of the Florida, in the cases of the Alexandria and the Pampero, and in the case of the two French vessels ostensibly fitting out for the Viceroy of Egypt. We gave them notice when the Sumter was at Gibraltar. We gave them notice before the Shenandoah left Melbourne. We furnished notice to the British government, and Earl Russell admitted, when the Florida escaped, it was a disgrace to English law. We gave them that notice in the case of eighteen vessels. We did this, and when the war had closed and when the Geneva tribunal had decided, after the discussion as to indirect damages, that this Government was not entitled to recover indirect damages, the tribunal then passed on to the question of direct damages and agreed we could not recover for the expenses of the pursuit of these cruisers and that the only direct damages we could recover were those which resulted from the losses to the owners of vessels and cargoes and insurers from inculpated cruisers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when they had come to this decision what was the instruction of our Government to our counsel at Geneva? It was this:

> The President desires to have the subject discussed as one between the two governments; and he directs me to urge upon you strongly to secure, if possible, the award of a sum in gross. In the discussion of this question, and in the treatment of the entire case, you will be careful not to commit the Government as to the disposition of what may be awarded, or what may be recovered in the event of the appointment of the board of assessors, mentioned in the tenth article of the treaty. It is possible that there may be duplicate claims for some of the property alleged to have been captured and destroyed, as in the cases of insurers and insured. The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the rights and claims of insurers upon the termination of the case. If the value of the property captured or destroyed be recovered in the name of the Government, the distribution of the amount recovered will be made by this Government without committal as to the mode of distribution. It is expected that all such committals will be avoided.—Geneva Award Papers, volume 2, page 416.

And now, sir, we come to the real question. By the majority report, if it passes, the moral obligations of the Government are by this Congress transformed into legal obligations. If there is not enough moral perception in Congress to pass upon this question, then let it go to a court with the legal right only to be passed upon, and shut out moral obligations of every character; because this majority report, I say, transforms the moral obligations of this Government into legal ones.

Nothing but legal rights can be pursued in the court to which it is sent; nothing but legal rights can there be considered; no moral rights can be considered in that court. That court will say to these gentlemen when they go there with their claims, "Your Government has a moral claim resting on it to hear your petitions and redress your grievances, but while your Government has that moral right she has sent the matter to this court, which is not a court of conscience, which cannot deal in moral obligations, which must consider the cases on strictly legal rules, and you are therefore by an act of Congress stripped of your moral right to recover." The claimants who claim to be subrogated have a legal standing in court, but any person who has a moral claim on the Government has been cut off from every vestige of such claim.

I say that that is the effect of the majority report. I ask if it is not in the power of this House and its duty to hold this matter where it can discharge every moral obligation of the Government instead of removing it to a tribunal which, although it may have stronger moral perceptions than Congress, cannot bring one of those moral perceptions to bear on the claim except when disposing of the legal rights of the parties concerned. It would be morally bound as a court of law in the discharge of its functions to pass upon a naked legal right of the claimant and could not lend its ear to one who would claim the Government was morally bound to pay his loss. The clause in the bill of the majority report to dispose of the money as it should in justice, equity, and under the law of nations, simply amounts to this: the insurers will claim the arbitrators decided the case under the law of nations; therefore the Court of Claims is bound under the act to pay to them and no others, as their claims were so recognized by the arbitrators in shutting out claims against exculpated cruisers. The law of nations seeks no place here in this discussion. This Government has the full right unchallenged to do with this fund what seemeth good in its sight.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to the third section of the foreign-enlistment act, because I desire to have it incorporated in what I have to say. It is as follows:

> SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall within the limits of the United States fit out and arm, or attempt to fit out and arm, or procure to be fitted out and armed, or shall knowingly be concerned in the furnishing, fitting out, or arming of any ship or vessel, with intent that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people, to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, or property of any foreign prince, or state, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace, or shall issue or deliver a commission within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States for any ship or vessel to the intent that she may be employed as aforesaid, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not more than $10,000, and imprisoned not more than three years; and every such ship or vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with all materials, arms, ammunition, and stores which may have been procured for the building and equipment thereof, shall be forfeited, one-half to the use of the informer, and the other half to the use of the United States.

As I said a short time since, under an act precisely like this passed by the English government, together with the law of international rule in cases of piracy which she reciprocated to this nation, this Government had to go to Europe to furnish proof to prosecute the pirates in her courts of justice under her laws against piracy. England furnished us not an iota or scintilla of aid either in those cases or any of the cases of vessels claimed by us as being out as confederate war-vessels. We gave them notice that the Tuscaloosa had been eight days in an English port and had transformed prizes of war into war-tenders, because the confederates had no prize court or court of admiralty; so the Tuscaloosa, after burning what she could not take care of, carried the rest to an English port. Under the rules of neutrality she would only have had time to coal up and leave, whereas after remaining eight days she left her captured prize, transformed into a war-tender, and preyed upon our commerce, and soon this war-tender, full fledged as a war-vessel, sailed the seas destroying our commerce. Thus by that act of the English government our property was destroyed. This Government never yielded the point that there was any such thing as inculpating or exculpating cruisers in the case, and the Government instructed its counsel at Geneva to see to it that the sum awarded should be in gross. What damages were recovered she desired to control so she could give to her children equitably, and would not be constrained by legal rights alone, and would not allow the legal rights of parties to be set up as a barrier against the claim of those who had a moral claim against the Government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that these claims did not grow up strictly under the law of nations, they grew out of the foreign enlistment act; and when she gave notice of this fact, Earl Russell, Her Majesty's secretary for foreign affairs, turned around and said to Mr. Charles Francis Adams, "we have a foreign-enlistment act for our own benefit; we enacted it for our benefit and not for yours." Afterward when the Florida had escaped he said in a speech at Manchester, that the escape of the Florida was a disgrace to British law. Sir Roundell Palmer, now lord chancellor and then attorney-general of the British government, stood up in Parliament and said that it was one of the triumphs of British justice that British law did not proceed on suspicion, after we had proceeded on suspicion during the Crimean war and after the Government had acted with equal promptness in the case of the Fenians on the Canadian border.

This Government, sir, has never yielded the point that every vessel that left Great Britain equipped in British waters and manned by British seamen was an act of war on the part of that government, just as much an act of war as any act that any government could perform against another nation. Due notice had been given to the British government; and I say again that if you transfer this case to a court of equity or tribunal of equity or to a court of law, you deprive every man who has a moral claim of any benefit it could confer. Suppose that I, when I found that I could avoid the payment to my children of what I was under a moral obligation to them to pay, by saying to them, I will submit the case to a court of law, thus transferred to a court of law, where no moral obligations can prevail, where even equity can have no place, I thereby shirk from and avoid my moral obligations, thus disgracing myself, wronging my family, and setting at naught that principle of domestic relations dictated by the laws of conscience and by natural affection.

Mr. Speaker, we might have disposed of the question at issue between this Government and Great Britain as a question of international law without having required her to pay one cent of money. The principle involved and the damages to be paid was a question existing entirely between the two governments. Consequently when this Government received the damages awarded, it became as much her duty to consider the claims of one class of persons who suffered as another. The Government can stand upon no legal right. A moral obligation is as much binding upon her as any other. Her subjects who have a moral claim are as fully entitled to have that claim satisfied as those having a legal claim. They suffered damage; it was direct damage—as much the necessary and proximate or natural result of the wrongful act complained of as any legal claim, and if this Congress shall adopt the majority report and send this matter to the Court of Claims, it avoids the performance of its moral obligations and sends it to a tribunal which cannot consider a moral obligation, and creates legal rights that do not now exist, and destroys moral obligations that its sovereignty should shield and protect.

Mr. CONGER. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.]

Mr. BLOUNT. If agreeable to the House, I would like now to proceed with the consideration of the post-office deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. CONGER. Let these gentlemen speak who are now ready in my time.

The SPEAKER. At the end of the hour of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.]

Mr. BLOUNT. Very well; I will not press it now.

Mr. BURCHARD. It has been contended, Mr. Speaker, by those who favor the bill reported by the majority of the Judiciary Committee, that distribution of the sum awarded by the arbitrators at Geneva should be made by this Congress only to the sufferers by cruisers for whose acts Great Britain was decided by the award to be responsible. It has been claimed that the nation accepted this money as trustee for the parties who preferred their claims before that tribunal; that under the law of nations the Government acted as trustee, and as such trustee is bound to make the distribution of this fund to those sufferers whose damages formed the basis upon which the arbitrators determined the amount to be paid to the United States. Now, I do not find that the authorities on international law sustain any such position. I find that, as cited in the minority report, the courts themselves have repudiated the doctrine. Sir Alexander Cockburn in his opinion accompanying this very award says that the two nations were treating with each other as nations in regard to national obligations and national rights.

In its negotiations and treaty with Great Britain in regard to the Alabama claims the United States acted for itself as a nation, and not as agent for claimants. The award was made to it as a nation, and the proofs in regard to particular losses were necessary only to ascertain what damage the acts of Great Britain as a nation had occasioned. Neither the award nor the treaty limited the disposition of the fund awarded. The United States was left wholly free to dispose of the money according to the equities of the parties who suffered from the claims which were satisfied and finally disposed of and barred by the adjudication. The award barred the United States from asserting thereafter any claims generally known as the Alabama claims; that is, injuries done by confederate cruisers built, equipped in, or sailing from the ports of Great Britain. But the proofs submitted by the United States before the arbitrators to ascertain what sum or measure of indemnity should be awarded to be paid by Great Britain to the United States gave claimants whose injuries were then proved no vested nor exclusive interest in the award. Their rights, equities, and claims were open for examination, allowance, or rejection by the United States when it should distribute the fund awarded.

The claims which the United States made upon Great Britain were for damages inflicted and losses occasioned by all the confederate cruisers. There was awarded, and the United States accepted, a sum in gross in satisfaction and final settlement of all claims the United States had upon Great Britain for their acts.

In distributing this award so as to apply the money in reimbursing actual sufferers from the depredations of these cruisers the Government violates no legal right or moral duty. It accomplishes the highest equity.

I object to the bill reported here by the majority of the committee, because under its provisions this case is not submitted to any tribunal upon its whole merits. It restricts the judgment to be rendered by the court to each claimant who was the actual sufferer by a violation of the laws of neutrality by Great Britain for such an amount as he shall be entitled to recover under the treaty and award. The tribunal is to be governed by the award in determining who is a sufferer. The award fixed the liability of Great Britain, ruling out certain cruisers; and in computing the measure of damages to be assessed against Great Britain, excluded a portion of the claims presented under the treaty of Washington.

Hence it appears upon the very face of the bill that jurisdiction is denied the court to a class of claims which some members of the committee, explaining this bill, say the court ought to have equitable jurisdiction to hear and determine there. There is danger that such will be the construction of the law if the majority bill should pass; for under the award Great Britain was exculpated as to certain cruisers, and for those depredations claimants, if restricted by the decision of the award, would be absolutely ruled out.

As to the proofs which were submitted before that tribunal, they were merely presented for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of damages that the nation had suffered, not to establish the rights of claimants. That tribunal in passing upon the question of indirect claims, as they are called, the question of enhanced rates of insurance, did not rule that those claims should not be taken into account in the distribution of the award. But the question for them to determine was in regard to the payment of damages, what was the actual destruction of property; what property was destroyed belonging to the United States, or the citizens of the United States for the destruction of which Great Britain was responsible. The amount of property thus destroyed was doubtless the measure of damages. As to the equities of the parties, the question to whom this distribution should be made was left perfectly free and open, so far as anything in the treaty is concerned. If there had been a provision in the treaty that restricted the American nation in the distribution of this award, then it would be incumbent upon us to distribute the award according to the terms of the treaty. But the treaty itself, the negotiations, all that was done, leave that question open to be determined according to the equities of the case.

There may be a moral obligation which the Government itself ought to respect, but there is nothing in the law of nations and nothing in the treaty to restrict our action. We are here perfectly free, representing the American people, to make this distribution according to the principles of equity, according to the highest equity, as it appears to us. And we shall not have discharged our duty if we refer this question to some tribunal to act upon it without regard to the equities that appear in the case.

Now, who have the highest equities in this fund, accepted by the United States in satisfaction of the claims described in the treaty? Those who really suffered by the injuries of which the United States made complaint and which were referred to the tribunal. Injuries to citizens of the United States who really suffered should be compensated. It appears from the evidence presented before the former commission, and which is now before us, that in the first place is to be considered those who were owners of property and who were injured when that property was destroyed. Some whose property was destroyed were reimbursed by the insurance companies, and under the doctrine of subrogation those companies would be substituted, in so far as the owners were recompensed, and receive the amount contributed by them.

But there is a further equity. Of whom did the insurance companies receive the money which they paid to the parties whose property was destroyed by the cruisers? They collected it from the men who paid the enhanced war premiums. The latter have just as high an equity to be substituted and subrogated for the insurance companies to the extent of their payments as the insurance companies have to the amount which they advanced to the owners of the property. But there is danger, if not certainty, that under the bill of the majority this equity will be disregarded. The bill refers this question to the Court of Claims. How is the judgment to be rendered, and upon what principles determined? According to "justice, equity, and the law of nations." The law of nations does not apply to this case: there is nothing in the treaty so limiting it. How is the court to interpret that direction? It is a court of limited jurisdiction, so decided in 9 Wallace, in the case of Benson vs. United States, which held that the Court of Claims had jurisdiction to render judgment upon contracts, but no equitable jurisdiction. You refer these questions to a law court, giving it no equitable jurisdiction, no chancery powers—only requiring it to do what? To render a judgment according to justice, equity, and the law of nations, a common-law proceeding. Under the authority to decide questions according to justice and equity will this court assume chancery jurisdiction? If it does, will it take the broad view that it is not to confine its interpretation of equity to cases already adjudicated and recognized under that which insurance companies are subrogated to the rights of the insured, or will it go still further and admit that those who suffered loss by the payment of war premiums shall be subrogated to the rights of such insurance companies as have sustained no loss? We ask that in the distribution of this sum we shall ourselves instruct the court to be governed by this highest equity, the substance of which is embodied in the substitute offered by the minority.

Mr. CONGER. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MONROE.]

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Speaker, there is one inquiry which is fundamental in this discussion and from which have arisen most of the differences of opinion which have been expressed. That inquiry is, ought the United States, in distributing the Geneva award, to be subject to the same limitations and governed by the same considerations as those which determined the action of the Geneva tribunal?

In trying to arrive at an answer to this inquiry, it may be convenient to consider the duties of a nation as coming under two classes, those which it owes to other nations and those which it owes to its own citizens.

To other nations each government owes all the offices of a good neighbor. It is not only bound to abstain from inflicting injury upon others, but it must use all vigilance and put forth its best endeavors, that it may not be made the occasion of injury. It may not always be in its power to accomplish this object perfectly. In that case, responsibility is limited by ability; but no excuse can avail it, if it falls short of doing the best that it can for this end.

To its own citizens every nation owes protection—protection to life, liberty, and property. This, indeed, is what it principally owes. It must afford such protection to its people that they will be left at liberty to follow all honest and useful avocations without fear of interruption by violence or fraud. It must secure equal protection, and protection both by land and sea. Everything which a nation owes may perhaps be included under the head of protection. In saying this, I only repeat what is familiar to us all as one of the most elementary principles of government. There are, of course, natural limitations to what a nation can do in protecting its citizens. Some of their interests lie outside of its jurisdiction, and are beyond the reach of its power to protect. But the best that it can do in this direction, is plainly its duty.

The destruction inflicted upon our commerce during the late war was the result of failure on the par of two great nations to discharge their duties—the failure of England to be a good neighbor and the failure of the United States to be the protector of its citizens; the failure of England to prevent her harbors, her resources, her military stores from being used to destroy our ships, and the failure of the United States to secure that ordinary degree of safety for its merchant marine which is expected of civilized and well-governed nations even in time of war.

England's failure in duty was the ground of the Geneva award. It was decided that she had not used proper vigilance. In determining the amount of the indemnity which she should pay to the United States, the tribunal, first of all, took into account the natural limitations of her responsibility. They absolved her, very properly, no doubt, from all obligations to pay indirect losses. They were also under the necessity of considering what award would be consistent with the general welfare of nations. They must establish a safe precedent. They not only took into account what was fair between England and the United States, but also what would be permissible and practicable among the nations of Europe. Their award must be heavy enough to deter other nations from such negligence and yet not so heavy as to be impracticable or to tempt governments to try to escape payment by resorting to war. The members of the tribunal were acting from an international stand-point. In part they were controlled by, and in part they were making, international law. They had to consider, not only what was abstract justice, but also what the public sentiment of the civilized world would sustain. They could not avoid asking what would be a wise and beneficent precedent among nations. We have all read the standard writers of English history, Hume and Clarendon, Froude and Macaulay. Any one who will refresh his memory for a moment in regard to those portions of the works of these authors which set forth the relations of England to the powers of the continent, will remember many instances in which negotiations between Great Britain and other nations were affected and modified by the influence of a third party. All history teaches that no difficulty between two nations ever was settled by arbitrators chosen from abroad precisely as if those two nations were the only ones in the world. In all cases of joint arbitration by representatives of several powers, a broader view is taken than the mere matter in dispute—broader than the interests of the nations which are parties to it. It is not possible that such an arbitration should be conducted without some reference to what the great family of nations would approve and what would harmonize with the common prosperity. These, then, are the grounds upon which the Geneva award was made.

But the ground on which the United States should distribute the money it has received, is evidently quite different. Our citizens lost their commerce through the failure of the Government to protect them, and it must so distribute the money at its disposal as to make good, so far as possible, the injuries resulting from this failure. When the war broke out our Government was taken unprepared. It had to consider how the limited force which it had could be most effectively employed to preserve the Union. It decided upon a policy which was no doubt a wise one but which left our commerce mostly to perish. Thus while the war sustained agriculture and greatly stimulated manufactures, it swept our commerce from the ocean. No true patriot complained of this most unequal distribution of burdens. There was no great interest at the North which would not cheerfully have consented to be sacrificed had the preservation of the national life demanded it. But certainly it was the duty of the Government, when the war was over, to do something to compensate the robbed and impoverished class for the ruin of their industries. It often happens in the hard exigencies of war that different classes suffer very unequally, but no great and generous nation ever came out of such a war without attempting some rough approximation toward placing all portions of the people upon equal terms. The propriety of this is recognized whenever a war claim is paid. It is recognized in this House in the very fact that we have a committee to receive and consider such claims. We pay about thirty millions of dollars per annum in pensions to soldiers and those dependent upon them. What is this but a rude attempt to place those who voluntarily accepted the privations and dangers of war upon a plane of something like equal advantage with those who remained at home.

The stand-point of our Government, then, in distributing this award, is not international, but domestic. It would be absurd for the United States to be governed in the work of distribution by the diplomatic influences which made themselves felt at Geneva. England paid the award to make good her failure as a neighbor. This nation distributes it to make good its failure as a protector of its citizens.

Since, then, the stand-point of the Geneva tribunal was different from that now occupied by this country, it is evident that the fields of investigation in the two cases might not entirely coincide. The field which the tribunal would cover might at some points be broader and at others narrower than ours. Few, I think, will contend that we, in meeting the needs of our citizens, can give weight only to the considerations which prevailed at an international conference, especially as we are only imperfectly informed as to what they were. The two ends in view, that of Geneva and that of the United States, may cover in large degree the same ground, but still they are distinct ends. Some of the most grievous losses suffered by our citizens were those of vessels destroyed by the Shenandoah before she entered Melbourne. In this case England was acquitted of responsibility. There was, indeed, much that in equity made England responsible for the ravages of the Shenandoah from the very beginning. The general policy, however, of the great family of nations forbade that she should be held responsible, and we cheerfully submit. But the claim to protection from us of vessels which were destroyed by the Shenandoah before she entered the harbor of Melbourne, is just as perfect as that of vessels which were destroyed afterward. The claim of our citizens to be protected from losses by the exculpated steamers is just as valid as their claim to protection from losses by the inculpated steamers.

I repeat, then, that the end to be achieved by our Government in distributing the indemnity received is to make good the losses resulting from our failure to protect our citizens. This makes it our duty to pay for the class of vessels already named—those that were destroyed by the Shenandoah before Melbourne. So, too, we should make compensation for losses growing out of increased war premiums. Here also protection was due from us, but was not afforded, and burdensome losses occurred. As regards the insurance companies, I cannot discover that they had any exposed interest during the war or any interest that suffered. They had no interest which the Government could protect or could fail to protect. An intelligent secretary was all the protection they needed. They had only to put their premiums high enough and all their interests were safe. They were glad to take large risks, and they continued to do this with profit to the end of the war. The risks of marine insurance, like those of life insurance, have been reduced to a science. In time of war the officers of an insurance company have only to read the papers and look at their tables, and if a case of doubt should arise, they can give the company the benefit of the doubt, and put the premium high enough to meet all emergencies. The very large net profit which the insurance companies made during the war furnishes evidence that they did not forget to avail themselves of these principles of their business.

Let us not, then, attempt to act the part of an international tribunal, seeking to adjust difficulties between nations, but the part of a just and beneficent nation, seeking to compensate its own citizens. Let us help those who need help—those who have suffered heavy losses through our failure to secure to them legitimate and efficient protection.

Mr. CONGER. I now yield seven minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN.]

Mr CHITTENDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am less fortunate than the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who felicitated himself on Saturday that the local interests of his constituents were not involved in this discussion, and who was frank enough to say he would not trust the judgment of himself or any gentleman otherwise situated.

My immediate constituents are concerned in the business now before the House, and I myself have a personal interest in it. I hope, nevertheless, in the few remarks I have to make, to show that I am not disqualified to judge the case fairly.

Since 1843 I have been a part of the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company, of New York, than which no better insurance company ever existed.

However inconsequential my interest may be, I suppose my right to share its fortunes, past and present, is as genuine and incontrovertible as the right of any member of the association. The foreign business of my firm during the war was mainly with England and France, and our goods were necessarily brought to us in foreign ships. We paid no war premiums, or if any very rarely, but our profits and dividends from the company were made upon its general business, and such profits and dividends have never been for a period of years more rewarding than during the war period.

The majority report under consideration, while in terms referring the whole subject of distributing the money in hand in the last resort to the highest court, is yet in effect a bill to pay insurance companies and nobody else. Under the bounds and limitations of the Geneva tribunal this conclusion in the end is unavoidable. I frankly admit, Mr. Speaker, that in listening to my colleague [Mr. POTTER] on Friday I felt that his argument was conclusive in the case, if we are to be governed by clear, cold, pitiless technicalities without regard to equity and eternal justice. But on reflection I think the majority report ought not to be adopted until two important questions have been settled.

First. How will the United States remunerate its suffering citizens whose property was destroyed by the exculpated British cruisers? None are more deserving. Their chance if the majority report is adopted is nil. Every lawyer knows it. Why mock them with any pretext to the contrary?

Secondly. What is to be the final disposition of three or four millions of this fund, more or less, which may in the end prove to be in excess of the claims admitted and adjudicated by the Geneva tribunal?

As a member of the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company I will never, by any act of mine, consent to touch one cent of this money until these questions are disposed of. Let us not forget for one moment that our country is about to assert her rightful supremacy in the commerce of the whole world. We must keep our honor bright. We cannot afford to sully it for nine, or ninety, or nine hundred millions. Let us not hesitate to send all the award we now have in possession, or any part of it, where the fishery award has gone, if we got it by mistake. An example of the highest type of national honor is in order now for us. This case furnishes a rare and grand opportunity for its exercise. I trust we shall utilize it for the honor and advancement of our own fifty millions of people, and for the instruction of mankind. It will pay us, as a people, richly, to be scrupulously upright and just in disposing of what remains of the Geneva award, and so much the more so because we were euchred at Halifax.

Mr. CONGER. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from California, [Mr. LUTTRELL.]

Mr. LUTTRELL. Mr. Speaker, in the early part of the first session of this Congress I introduced a bill providing for the proper distribution of the Geneva award among the several equitable claimants who were actual losers by the Alabama and other confederate cruisers. The substitute or bill reported by Mr. MCMAHON from the Judiciary Committee, and now under consideration by the House, embodies all that was contemplated by my bill and makes full and equitable provisions for the distribution to actual losers, and is, in my judgment, strictly in harmony with the award of the arbitrators at Geneva, and if enacted by Congress will carry out fully to all intents and purposes the conditions of said award, meeting out justice to all losers equitably. The intention of the arbitrators was to fully indemnify the United States Government and the citizens thereof for all actual, but not for prospective losses, as alleged by grasping insurance companies. The Geneva award, with accumulated interest, amounts to upward of $20,000,000. Four years ago Congress authorized the payment out of the fund of what were regarded as the most meritorious claims, but when all these are settled there will still remain a balance of some ten millions in the custody of the Government. The question as to what is to be done with this surplus is one of the highest importance. It is a question that concerns the national honor, if not indeed the peace of the world.

The settlement of international controversies by arbitration may depend upon a proper disposition of this money. The opinion is general that it ought to be paid out to parties who sustained loss by the act or negligence of Great Britain, if such parties can be found, and, in any event, that it ought to be paid out to the extent of such claims. If, however, meritorious claims cannot be found to cover the whole of it, the fact will show that Great Britain was overreached in the arbitration, and the money remaining might in all fairness be returned to her exchequer. We should not, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, take advantage of or profit by a misapprehension or possible misrepresentation at Geneva. No part of the money was intended to replenish the Treasury of the United States, and if not distributed to private parties, as intended, it had better swell the conscience fund of Great Britain than remain an incubus upon the conscience of this country. In the Government Treasury it will be a subject of contention as long as it remains there, and in the end prove to be a burden rather than a gain to the nation.

But there are demands against the fund aside from those already recognized about which there should be little controversy. The direct claimants have been cut short in various ways, and that should be made up so far as it can be by allowing to them 6 per cent. upon their judgments instead of 4 per cent. The allowance at Geneva was undoubtedly 6 per cent., and that too in gold, while the judgments are payable, principal and interest, in currency, the interest being computed at 4 per cent. a year only. Besides, the judgments are, as a rule, for much less sums than were presented by citizens to the Department of State, and they were presented there upon the invitation of that Department and in accordance with its prescribed rules, and they were by it in turn urged before the tribunal at Geneva and unquestionably allowed.

In addition to this, claimants have been compelled to incur heavy expenses in order to properly present and maintain their several demands. In some cases the claim, though indisputable, has been exceeded by the disbursements, and in every case it has been much reduced by them. It would seem, in view of these facts, that the additional 2 per cent. ought to be allowed without hesitation on the part of Congress.

The next class of claims in the order of merit are those for damage by British-built cruisers other than the Alabama, Florida, and the Shenandoah. These claims are for direct losses, and are hardly distinguishable from those which have already been allowed. But all of the above unrecognized claims would not consume more than three or four millions of the surplus, and would still remain in the fund undisposed of, a balance of at least six or seven million dollars. To this large surplus the insurance companies are laying claim; and those who paid what are called war premiums upon sea-borne property, whether ships or cargoes, are likewise making claim to this same balance. This latter class are actually out of pocket the amounts so paid by them, and they put their claims upon strictly equitable grounds, as indeed all claims upon the fund must be put, since no one has a legal right to share in the money until Congress confers that right. It was the money of these claimants so paid in as war premiums that went to reimburse a portion of the losses that did actually occur. As a matter of fact, while these individual property-holders are out the amounts so severally paid by them, the individual stockholders of the insurance companies lost nothing whatever. On the contrary, each shareholder in an insurance company made money by the operations of his company; for the insurance companies, through their officers, always charge a rate of insurance sufficiently high to cover all probable losses, and with rare exceptions they come out gainers in the business, as the following telegram of rates of charges will show:

NEW YORK, June 24, 1863.

To THOMAS DAY, San Francisco:

Have insured the Tell, Donati, and Crockett, at 19½ per cent. and the America at 30 per cent.

MITCHELL, VANCE & CO.

Thirty thousand dollars war premium paid on one hundred thousand dollars' worth of goods by Mr. Day. So much for the grasping greed of the insurance corporations of whom the gentleman from New York speaks in such glowing terms: liberal gentlemen; liberal managers; liberal corporations; liberality that crushes the merchant, the ship-builder, and poor sailor, and enriches corporations. But there was no way by which the war-premium-payer or the poor hard-worked and unfortunate American sailor could get his money back, and he or they never did and never will get it back, unless Congress authorizes its payment out of the "Geneva award." The following synopsis or report of the business of the several marine insurance companies for the years as stated, made generally from their own official returns, namely, for the five years 1861 to 1865 inclusive, which take in all the period of war premiums and war losses, and second for the five years 1866 to 1870, immediately succeeding the war, will show the reasons why these companies did not (could not) present to the court any claims for losses under the law of June 23, 1874, simply because their war business had been an immensely profitable, not a losing business to them:

1861–'65.	Premiums.	Losses and expenses.	Net profits.
Atlantic Mutual	$30,966,601 54	$19,920,895 66	$11,045,705 88

Washington Marine, 1861–'65	1,766,842 00	1,492,603 30	274,238 70
Total	78,921,499 07	55,348,359 70	23,573,139 37

The eight companies first above named are footed separately from the other two, which failed and discontinued business at an early period, and therefore are not taken in the account of the five years (1866–'70) following:

1866–'70.	Premiums.	Losses and expenses.	Net profits.
Atlantic Mutual	$33,902,974 71	$23,729,339 83	$10,173,634 88

Commercial Mutual	2,079,402 59	1,308,657 08	770,745 51

Pacific Mutual	3,470,581 02	2,571,254 71	899,326 31
Union Mutual for 1866, 1868, 1869, 1870, (4 years)	941,549 36	603,553 55	422,494 76
For 1867, estimated	235,387 34	150,888 39
	63,197,564 27	47,153,340 38	16,419,979 18
Take from profits the loss of the Sun Mutual			375,755 29
Leaves net profits for the five years			16,044,223 89

The net profits of the ten New York companies for the years 1861–'65, on the total amount of premiums received, amounted to 29.869 per cent. And for the eight companies (leaving out the Columbian and the Washington) the net profits were 28.755 per cent. For the same eight companies the net profits for the years 1866–'70 amounted to 25.387 per cent. Thus the years of the war were more favorable to these eight companies by 3.368 per cent., or $2,295,332.96, after paying all losses, war and otherwise, than the five years of peace (1866–'70) which followed.

The returns of these companies do not separate the war premiums from those on ordinary risks, therefore the profits of the war business do not appear by themselves.

These New York insurance companies claim to have lost by war risks in the years 1861–'65, as appears in the "Revised list of claims filed with the Department of State," as follows, to wit:

The Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company		$1,791,616 00
The Sun Mutual Insurance Company		265,158 09
The Commercial Mutual Insurance Company		89,962 00
The New York Mutual Insurance Company		94,342 00
The Mercantile Mutual Insurance Company		95,435 00
The Great Western Insurance Company		334,810 00
The Pacific Mutual Insurance Company		131,953 00
The Union Mutual Insurance Company		68,428 26
Eight companies		2,871,724 35
The Columbia Insurance Company	$780,713 68
The Washington Marine Insurance Company	36,170 89
		816,884 57
Claimed for losses by ten New York companies		3,688,608 92

After paying which, and all other losses and expenses for the five years, (1861–'65,) which included the whole period of the civil war, they had left a clear profit of $23,573,139.37.

It shows conclusively that the insurance companies made millions, while they that paid exorbitant special war premiums lost all. Can we as the sworn representatives of the people stand here and ignore the rights of the actual losers? Can we rightfully take this fund and give it to the insurance companies who made their millions, and leave the actual loser, who paid exorbitant war premiums, without compensation for his losses? Can we do this and at the same time say that we are carrying out the objects of the Geneva arbitration? I think not!

But it is sometimes said that the merchant added the amount of the premium to the price of his goods, and thus made himself whole; but that could not be, for his goods were in competition with merchandise not insured or which was imported in neutral vessels, and there was clearly no possibility of recovering money so paid for insuring vessels which were not sold at all. While it would be entirely practicable to pay out this money to war-premium claimants, all of whom are American citizens, there would be insuperable difficulties in the way of distributing it among insurance companies the stockholders in which are in many instances foreigners and not unfrequently British subjects. Upward of forty companies were engaged in the business of insuring against capture during the war, and some of them were at the same time insuring against fire and ordinary marine disaster. A large proportion of those companies are not now in existence, having wound up their business, or have been broken up by the Chicago and Boston fires. The books and assets of a number of them are in the hands of receivers or assignees in bankruptcy, and are in various stages of legal proceedings. Their claims against the Alabama fund have in some instances been disposed of at forced sale and bought for less than a song.

Inevitably great complications and injustice would result from an attempt to pay over the balance of this money to the insurance companies, while there would be no difficulty in distributing it among the loyal war-premium claimants and the gallant sailors in sums exactly covering the loss of each. And this would be an equitable and just solution of the whole difficulty. The claimant would have to state and prove his account, as well as his individual right to recover. And there would be no possibility of the money going in the wrong direction or to unworthy parties.

Let the majority amend the bill so as to include all—each and every one who has sustained loss, whether as merchants, shippers, ship-owners, sailors, or war-premium payers; include all—each and every one who has sustained loss by confederate cruisers at any time between and including the years 1861 and 1865, permitting each to present his or their claim to the courts; exhibiting both pages of their ledgers, the loss and the profit, presenting his or their claim with all the facts. Do this, and the insurance companies will show a net profit of nearly $25,000,000 received from war-premium payers alone. While Metcalf and others will show losses for which they demand at your hands such legislation as will enable them to recover their just dues, which are and will be excluded under the bill proposed by the majority of committee, unless amended. The bill proposed by the majority of the committee is so ingeniously worded that, if passed, it will enable the insurance companies to defeat all honest claimants through legal quibbles and technicalities. I will cheerfully vote for any bill that will open the doors of the courts to all actual losers, paying to each his or their actual loss, to the extent of the fund. I care not when nor where property was destroyed by confederate cruisers; it should make no difference in the distribution and payment under the award. We should not keep these poor men waiting for years, subject to the legal quibbles of grasping corporations, but hear and determine the actual loss of each, taking into consideration the loss and profit, that justice may be done to the poor man as well as to soulless corporations who have grown rich over the misfortunes of the gallant sailors, the merchant, ship-builder, and war-premium payer of the late war. Let us once more legislate for the people, and not for the especial interest and benefit of insurance companies and corporations.

Mr. Speaker, this is a square contest between the insurance companies on the one side and the people on the other, represented by E. W. Metcalf, owner of the ship Delphine, which was destroyed by the Shenandoah just before reaching Melbourne. The insurance companies have made a special fight against Mr. Metcalf for the reason that the claims of many others depend upon Metcalf's success; yes, many other actual losers who are too poor to come here or fee attorneys and are watching with eager eye the result of this contest. Hence the strong opposition on the part of the insurance companies to the passage of any bill that provides for the payment of Metcalf's claim. The Metcalf claim is the claim of the people; it is a representative claim of the actual loser. He stands here single-handed and alone, upon merit, opposed by all of the legal talent the wealth of corporations can command, opposed by sleek and oily-tongued lobbyists, opposed by all the powers and machinations that money can invent. Shall we espouse the cause of moneyed corporations or that of the poor, weak, and helpless sailors who have but one claim, that of justice and equity? I see but one road open to me, and that is to do my duty and espouse the cause of the weak, the side of justice and equity.

Unless we pursue this course we, the democrats of this Congress, will fall into the same groove through which former Congresses have traveled for the last fifteen years, the result of which has been to build up aggregated capital and corporations at the expense of honest toil; that has given to corporations hundreds of millions of acres of the people's lands, hundreds of millions of the people's money and bonds; that has exempted the bonds held by rich corporations from taxation while all the products of labor are taxed; that has degraded labor by inviting to our shores, for the benefit of corporations and cheap-labor advocates, hordes of cooly slaves, thereby impoverishing the poor and creating distrust and discontent in the hearts of laboring-men all over our broad land. Let us avoid this by protecting the people, the actual losers, against the unjust claims of greedy and grasping insurance corporations. Look around this House, look along the corridors, look in any direction you please, and you will see the sleek lobbyist button-holing members to vote for the bill advocated by the insurance companies. Very few, if any, of the actual losers are here. The poor men and sailors who paid war premiums are not here. They were ruined by the war and the high war premiums charged by these rich and aristocratic insurance corporations. They are too poor to come here. They have no money to fee attorneys to advocate their claims, while the insurance companies are represented by the best legal talent in the land to press their bill.

The corporations or insurance companies have two objects in view, as follows: first, to pass their bill excluding all others but themselves from sharing in the award; second, in case of failure, to defeat the people's bill for the benefit of the actual loser and war-premium payer. They purpose to defeat all legislation that has for its object the distribution of the award among the actual losers, as was intended or contemplated by the arbitration at Geneva. They reason in this wise: that corporations never die; that men do; that but a few short years will elapse before Metcalf and Johnston, Rosenstock, and others will have been summoned to that final sleep that knows no waking, and then there will be no one here to contest the passage of a bill for the benefit of these soulless corporations to enable them to secure the balance of the Geneva award.

Mr. Speaker, we as the Representatives of the people should heed the prayer and petition of the poor men and brave sailors who demand at our hands the payment of the losses which they have sustained and for the payment of which Great Britain has paid into the Treasury of the United States Government a sum ample and sufficient to meet the demands of all just claims of actual losers. In every instance insurance companies have had made up to them by the court of Alabama claims all that they have lost. That is, in cases where they have failed to recover back for losses the court made it up to them. The insurance companies received in advance from those who paid war premiums more than they lost, except in four cases; and in those they had it made up to them by the court of Alabama claims. Place Metcalf, Johnston, and others who have lost ships and goods, upon the same equal footing or standing financially that the insurance companies occupied at the close of the war, or now occupy, and they will ask nothing more at the hands of Congress. Place these actual losers upon the same equal footing of the insurance corporations, and they will be content. Justice will have been meted out to all alike, and the objects of the arbitration at Geneva will have been a national success.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] now has eighteen minutes remaining.

Mr. CONGER. I will reserve that time for the present.

PAY OF HOUSE EMPLOYÉS FOR DECEMBER.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to offer a resolution pertaining to the organization of the House. It is necessary in order to enable the Clerk to prepare his pay-rolls for the present month in view of the coming vacation. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, to offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to pay the officers and employés of the House their respective salaries for the month of December, 1878, on the 20th day of said month, or as soon thereafter as practicable.

There being no objection the resolution was considered and adopted.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had adopted a resolution (in which the concurrence of the House was requested) providing that copies of Walker's Statistical Atlas, heretofore ordered for the use of the two Houses of Congress, be bound by the Public Printer.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, House bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 5535) changing the time of holding the terms of the United States circuit court for the district of West Virginia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5485) for the relief of Andrew Muckle.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, to the bill (H. R. No. 5230) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate, Mr. ALLISON, Mr. BLAINE, and Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 1460) to authorize the issue of certain duplicate registered bonds for the benefit of the Manhattan Savings Institution.

TRANSPORTATION OF MAILS BY RAILROADS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering House bill No. 5682, providing for a deficiency in the Post-Office Department.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CARLISLE in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5682) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for transportation of mails by railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879. The bill was read a first time.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, as the House will see, this is a proposition to add to the appropriations for the present fiscal year the sum of $450,000 for railway mail service, accompanied with a provision that the postal-car service shall not be increased beyond what it was on the 1st day of December, 1878. The Secretary of the Treasury in his report calls attention now, as he did during the last Congress, to the falling off of our revenues from the principal services, customs and internal revenue. In his report of last session he suggested that there should be a lopping off of expenditures in the matter of public buildings. He now goes further and does what the Committee on Appropriations have thought all the time might have been done; that is, he suggests that there may be economical legislation with reference to the postal service.

Mr. Chairman, it appears from the report of the Postmaster-General that there is not only a call for an addition of $450,000 to the appropriations for the current fiscal year, but a statement of a deficiency of about $300,000 chargeable to the fiscal year last expired. Sir, it sometimes happens that the Department itself may make mistakes in its estimates. It sometimes happens that purposely the expenses of the Department are estimated high with a view of compromising with the two Houses in reference to expenditures. At other times it happens, as it has in this case, that where there is an inability to get the sums of money required from Congress the Department sees fit to go forward and spend according to its original estimate without reference to the will of Congress. In the present case, as well as in the deficiencies of the last fiscal year, we have an illustration of the latter proposition.

The Committee on Appropriations, it will be remembered, reported at the last session of Congress, with the assent of every member of the committee, without regard to party, a bill in reference to the postal service—a bill framed after an examination and discussion of the railway service especially. The report of that committee was acceptable to this House and was unquestioned. Was that report right as the House then understood it? The committee at that time found that, owing to the great depression in public business following the panic of 1873, the increase of the service in 1875 over 1874 did not exceed 1 per cent. In 1876, as examination shows, the increase amounted to 3.54 per cent. From the official information of the Department as to its revenues and in view of the general paralysis of business we felt that we could safely assume, as we did assume, that there was no reason why the ratio of increase should be beyond that rate. The Committee on Appropriations were informed at that time that the cost of the service for the first and second quarters of the last fiscal year amounted to $4,536,856.76.

This would give the sum of $9,138,445.85. The committee then allowing for increase of service, added for safety the sum of $250,000, nearly $100,000 nearer the actual facts as have been ascertained by the Sixth Auditor's report than the Department itself estimated for. We added the increase of $250,000 for the next year, making $9,388,595.51. We deducted the estimate of the Department of 5 per cent. on eight million, leaving us after that deduction $9,317,041.52. We deducted 10 per cent. decrease on account of expiration of the contract term of certain railroads to which this did not before apply, making a sum of $9,161,883.52. Now, sir, the actual fact is, that from that cost there was a decrease of $155,157.90; yet this brought us to the sum of $9,151,883.52. Now deduct $60,000 saved from fines and we have less than the amount appropriated.

Again, sir, look at the figures addressed to the committee April 8, 1878. There the Department estimated the cost of the service on the 3d of last March at $9,138,445.85. They estimated the increase there only at $250,000. The increase for 1879, the current fiscal year, at 3½ per cent. would have been $328,595.57. The cost of 1877 and 1878 would then have been $9,388,445.85 for the last fiscal year. The cost for 1879 would then be $9,717,041.42. Now deduct $400,000, the 5 per cent. reduction, and we have $9,317,041. Then deducting $155,157.90, the 10 per cent. reduction certified to by the Department, and you have left $9,151,883.52. Allowing $60,000 for fines you have $9,091,883.52.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the gentleman from Georgia a question. I followed him in his figures until he arrived at the estimated increase for 1879, which he put at 3½ per cent. I have a copy, as I suppose, in which I find the estimated increase was 7 per cent., the customary increase which long practice and service have taught the Department will occur yearly. Why does the gentleman from Georgia estimate the increase at only 3½ per cent. when the Department estimates at 7 per cent.? Or is there a mistake in my copy of the letter?

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman's letter is correct. I have not stated the letter from the Department made the estimate at 3½ per cent.

Mr. HALE. I think the impression was that you were speaking of a letter of the Department and were giving their estimate. It would not be fair to let it go that the Department only estimated for an increase of 3½ per cent.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman need not be uneasy about any unfairness to the Department or anybody else.

Mr. HALE. Would it be fair to let it go at 3½ per cent.?

Mr. BLOUNT. The proposition answers for itself. It is always unfair to be unfair.

Mr. HALE. Does the Department estimate an increase of 7 or 3½ per cent.?

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman will allow me to proceed with what I have to say, the Department will be vindicated so far as he seeks to vindicate it.

Mr. HALE. Will not the gentleman answer that question—does the Department estimate 3½ or 7 per cent.?

Mr. BLOUNT. I have stated to the gentleman the Department did not.

Mr. HALE. Did not what?

Mr. BLOUNT. Did not estimate the increase at 3½ per cent.

Mr. HALE. But did at 7 per cent.?

Mr. BLOUNT. But did at 7 per cent.

Mr. HALE. That is enough.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman is satisfied.

Mr. HALE. Certainly. I have now got an answer to my question.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman had not been so eager he would have been satisfied before I concluded what I had to say.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine, in asking the question here, determined to inject an assertion which is incorrect. He asked whether the Department did not estimate it at 7 per cent. I stated that my estimate was 3½ per cent., and that 3½ per cent. was based on previous years. The gentleman states what is incorrect when he says that the Department has learned from previous experience that the increased cost of railway service was at the rate of 7½ per cent. per annum. I have just stated that in 1875, as compared with 1874, it was a little beyond 1 per cent. The increase in the cost of 1876 over 1875 was 3½ per cent. If the House will refer to the report of the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury, gentlemen will find that the increase of expense of the postal service for the past fiscal year is at the rate of over $600,000, while the increase of 1875 over 1874 was $100,000, and 1876 over 1875 less than $300,000.

How comes this increase? Sir, the increase in the service has grown up, not from an increase in the weight of mails, not from an increase in the multiplication of the miles of railway service, but is largely owing to an indirect increase in the postal-car service. The increase in the postal-car service, if the information from the Department is correct, has been at the rate of more than 3½ per cent.—not on the postal-car service itself but on the whole railway service of the country. Since January, 1878, this increase, as far as we can gather, has been about 45 per cent. on the postal-car service itself. It will therefore be seen that this service being increased about $300,000 since January of the present year, this deficiency for the past year, 1878, comes from the determination of the Department against the will of the two Houses of Congress, after a contest between the Department, the Senate, and the House, that that service shall be increased even if the communities not reached by it, scattered abroad over this continent, shall be denied service; that even if the smaller, feebler corporations who are poorly paid shall have their pay suspended, this shall be increased until the postal-railway service shall have reached, in these times of hard pressure, a magnitude and a grandeur which challenge comparison with the magnificent mail services of any country in Europe.

The increased cost of the railway service properly used and the fines would have prevented any deficiency for the past fiscal year, and so if there had been the usual increase for postal-car service the Department would not be here now asking for the $450,000.

But, sir, not only is this true, but there is another fact connected with it. During the last session of this Congress there was a contest and a demand on the part of the Senate at the instance of the Department for an increase in the service. The Department was then aware of it. It was a warm struggle. The Senate yielded it. The legislation of the country pointed the Postmaster-General to the fact that he had so much money to spend, and he must accommodate himself to it.

Now, sir, let it be right or wrong, let it be subjected to criticism, if gentlemen see fit to do so, it lay not in the mouth of that officer to make this statement. He had had his day before Congress; he had had his contest before the Houses, and the agreement was reached that there should be only this sum. Had the Committee on Appropriations of the House known, or had this House known that there had been growing up in silence, while we were seeking to restrain expenditures, this magnificent postal-car service; had there been candor there would have been some justification. But, sir, there is not in any communication to these Houses any calculation of this great increase. The only thing we had during the last session, gentlemen will bear in mind, was a request for an increase of postal-car clerks and a description of the great strain on their physical powers.

I suspected that there had been some increase, and that this had occurred in this way. But there was nothing to give the information; and now this House is told, for the first time, that we have gone up from $700,000 to $1,017,000 without even the courtesy having been extended to us of allowing us to know what was going on.

While the service, sir, has been at the rate of $9,000,000, the postal-car service, involving these clerks and involving this increase of postal expenditure, has gone on secretly until we are told that we have got the grandest postal-car service in the world.

There is information, so far as we could gather in the present report, that the postal-car service for 1878 was but a slight increase in miles; that the postal-car service for the current fiscal year, 1879, has been decreased in miles of service. There has been some decrease in distances. But there is a failure, of which this House has a right to complain, to state the increase of the cost of the service; a failure to put this House upon its guard. And, sir, the only way it came out was by a re-examination of the increase in reference to this service assented to by every republican member of the House Committee on Appropriations at the time to see whether those figures were correct. Then we get the mystery of the 7 per cent. increase.

Mr. Chairman, while I am on this subject I desire to call attention to another fact. Prior to March, 1873, it will be remembered, it was not possible for any railroad company to get exceeding $300 per mile per annum, no matter what the weight of the mails might be. By the act of March 3, 1873, there was a change in relation to payments for the carriage of the mail; there was a provision to pay by weight:

> On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of two hundred pounds, $50; five hundred pounds, $75, &c.

I will not read it at greater length because the House is familiar with it. There was also in that act a provision that—

> In case any railroad company now furnishing railway post-office cars shall refuse to provide such cars, such company shall not be entitled to any increase of compensation under any provision of this act.

Then there is a provision in reference to the pay for postal cars.

Now it will be observed, Mr. Chairman, that this proviso intended that the railway companies might get at the rate of $1,000 or at the rate of $1,200 per mile per annum. If the Government desired the postal-car service and they refused to give it, the penalty was that they were remitted back to the old law, which restricted them to the maximum of $300 per mile per annum.

But, sir, while this act was passed in March, 1873, a short time afterward, in the revision of the statutes, in sections 4003 and 4004, the construction was put upon it or it was made to read that the only penalty was that they should not be paid for their postal cars. How absurd that construction that the company required to furnish postal cars should ask for payment for postal cars which they never furnished and that the Government should be so untrue to the interests of the Department that they would pay them! The construction is absurd; so that either by design or by a most unfortunate accident there was taken from the Post-Office Department this only power of compelling the railway companies to furnish postal cars by this reduction of the rate in many cases of two-thirds of their pay for carrying the mails.

Again, sir, in 1876 the Forty-fourth Congress, impressed with the necessity of reducing the expenditures, passed a bill providing for a decrease of 10 per cent. in the payments for weight of mails on the cars; the increase of the postal-car service had not been very great just before that in any sense. We had been told that there was difficulty in getting the service and that the railway companies were about to throw off the cars they had. In 1877–'78 there was a great increase in the postal-car service, and therefore an increase in the pay of railroads; there was a decrease in the number of miles on which the postal cars were run, but a large increase in the sum of money paid to the railroads. And when you come to the great trunk lines that have been making their complaints, they find it easy and find themselves so fortunate as to have this restraint of the Revised Statutes repealed; they find themselves so fortunate as to have the postal cars taken from other lines and put upon theirs; they find themselves so fortunate that when the Department has succeeded in doing that, in taking the postal cars from elsewhere and refusing mail service to insignificant routes, it stands and apostrophises the grandeur of the work it has done in increasing the service.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have occupied more time of the House than I intended.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to ask the gentleman a question before he closes.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will yield to him presently.

It is clear, sir, to my mind from these figures, which I deem correct, that the deficiency growing out of the appropriations of last year is chargeable upon the Department. It is clear that the action of the Department during this fiscal year has created the necessity for this increased appropriation. Not only that, sir, but the Department, having had its day in the last Congress on this question, allowed one-half of the year to go on, expended magnificently on the postal-car service, and when we assemble here gives us the information that it will not do what it did in 1878, punish the small lines; that they intend to utterly destroy the postal-car service, that in that way they may come within the appropriation, instead of commencing at the beginning of the fiscal year. Why, sir, if we can trust the report, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General himself has been interviewed by a reporter of the Post, and in that interview informed him of a triumph over Congress on this question; and that we are obliged to give him what he asks; that the press will be against us; that complaints over the land will grow up against us, and that the outcry will be loud. The superintendent of railway mail transportation utters this same language, and it goes forth over the country. I am not one of those so charitable as to think it is not done without design. The Representatives of the people are put in this attitude and are told "I could have conformed to your will six months ago, but I did not do it; I conformed to my own, and by doing that I will destroy the postal railway service of this country if you do not comply with my will."

Well, sir, the Committee on Appropriations determined not only to vote the sum asked for, the $400,000, but to add to it in accordance with a subsequent letter $450,000, so that there should be no excuse that the money had not been furnished; that there should be no occasion for the destruction of the postal-car system; that that service, while it was not to be destroyed because we had no time to examine it, shall not pass beyond what it was on the 1st day of December, 1878.

This, sir, leaves everything harmless; it leaves the committee in a condition where they can investigate hereafter with better light with reference to the service.

I have been unable to obtain anything like detailed information as to the postal-car service for the first six months of the last fiscal year and for the first six months of the current year. We have gross sums given us, but no information upon which we can legislate intelligently. Therefore we thought it best to allow this to stand as it now is, looking to the time near at hand when we shall prepare the post-office appropriation bill for the next fiscal year, and when we will, perhaps, be able to give this House such information as will enable it to act intelligently upon the subject. For the present, I will not say more.

Mr. HALE. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is through I ask him to yield to me.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. DUNNELL. I want to ask the gentleman from Georgia who has charge of this bill [Mr. BLOUNT] whether the amount specified in it covers the amount needed by the Post-Office Department to put service upon those railroads which have been constructed during the year?

Mr. BLOUNT. We have given every dollar that the Department estimated for.

Mr. DUNNELL. In my own State during the past year there have been constructed over 200 miles of railroad, most of it through the older portions of the State. The post-offices were adjusted to the railroad lines and the stage-routes were abandoned with the expectation that service would be ordered over the new routes of railroad. Much inconvenience was apprehended when it was announced by the Post-Office Department that no service would be put upon those new roads because of a lack of money. I would inquire if these new roads have been provided for?

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand that the estimate of the Department covers the new roads not only in the gentleman's State, not only throughout the West, but throughout the country.

Mr. DUNNELL. I have no controversy with the committee; I ask only for information.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Why is it that the gentleman puts in this bill a proviso, applying to the remaining seven months of the present fiscal year, directing that there shall be no increase in the postal service? New roads are being constructed all the time, and the public interest requires that postal service shall be established upon them. Why, then, is this limitation made?

Mr. BLOUNT. It is for the reason which I have already stated, that estimating upon the cost of 1876 the increase of the postal-car service has been at the rate of 45 per cent. It has not been upon the smaller lines; the service has rather been withdrawn from them and given to the great trunk lines.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will not the proviso in this bill prevent any postal-car service on any roads completed during that time?

Mr. BLOUNT. By no means.

Mr. PHILLIPS. That is the plain meaning of the proviso.

Mr. BLOUNT. The committee have found that there has been a very great increase in the postal-car service, and we believe, many of us, that on some of the lines there has been an increase far beyond what the public necessities require. Now, if the Department shall see fit to withdraw a part of that service from the lines on which it is now established in order to give it elsewhere, reversing the rule it has adopted during the last fiscal year, there will be no difficulty about it. But as a member of the Committee on Appropriations I can never give my assent to an increase at this time of the postal-car service after the strides it has been making of late.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will the gentleman have the proviso read? I think it means more than he states to the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no objection.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask that the proviso be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no increase in the postal-car service beyond what existed on the 1st of December, 1878, shall be made during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879.

Mr. PHILLIPS. According to that proviso there can be no increase during the seven months, even if the public interest shall demand it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand that language to mean that there shall be no increase in the cost of the postal-car service. I have no objection to changing the proviso so that it shall provide that there shall be no increase in the cost of the postal-car service.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Very well; that will do.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. You had better make it read "no increase in the total cost."

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I will ask consent to amend the proviso by inserting the words "total cost of;" so that it will read:

Provided, That no increase in the total cost of postal-car service beyond what existed on the 1st of December, 1878, shall be made during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879.

Mr. HALE. That will not do, because "the total cost" is what the cost amounted to up to December 1; and everybody understands that we are going to add to that total cost every day.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think that suggestion is correct.

Mr. HALE. It would be better to let the matter go until we come to the debate under the five-minute rule. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PHILLIPS] will defeat his own object if that language is put in.

Mr. BLOUNT. Very well; let it stand for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] now yield?

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE. What the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has been saying to the House amounts to this, that the money must be given; but he is going to exercise his high privilege of grumbling at the heads of the Departments. Now, I do not object to that very much. The heads of the Departments can commonly take care of themselves very well. But I know something about this subject, from having studied it in the Committee on Appropriations and at the Post-Office Department; and I do not want to see the Postmaster-General, who has been faithfully trying to do his duty, blamed when he should not be blamed.

The gentleman complains, first, that, going on needlessly and recklessly in the expenditure of money, the Postmaster-General has created a deficiency. Now, everybody who has been here for any length of time knows that during the last few years we have heard a great deal about the creation of deficiencies. Departments have been charged with expending all their money and then knocking at the doors of this House empty-handed and declaring that they must have money. Now, the Postmaster-General has done nothing of this kind. He was allowed by our appropriations a certain sum of money—something over $9,000,000—for the fiscal year. He has not spent all that money or most of it; he has a large share of it remaining. He has simply done this: taking the postal service as it existed on the 1st day of July, 1878, ramifying through all parts of this great country, he has simply kept up that rate of expenditure to the 1st of December with very little increase. It is not claimed that since last July the Postmaster-General has been putting on great additions. He has simply maintained that rate of expenditure until Congress should assemble. Then he comes to us in a letter which I have here and which I will ask to have printed as a part of my remarks.

Mr. BLOUNT. What is the date of the letter?

Mr. HALE. December 7, 1878.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., December 7, 1878.

SIR: In the annual report for 1877, the amount necessary to be appropriated for the transportation of mails by railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, was estimated at $10,140,126. The act of June 17, 1878, reduces the compensation fixed for weight of mails by previous laws 5 per cent., from July 1, 1878, and appropriates $9,100,000 to cover the cost of such service for the year 1879. It also provides that $125,000 of the sum appropriated may be used to obtain proper facilities from the great trunk lines of railroads for the railway post-office service.

In the annual report for 1878, I had the honor to submit for the consideration of Congress a statement showing the $9,100,000 appropriated, notwithstanding the reduction of 5 per cent., to be insufficient to cover the cost of transportation of mails by railroad for the current fiscal year. The cost of this service on the 30th of November, 1878, so far as the rates have been fixed, was at the rate of $9,440,000 per annum. Add to this the service established on newly constructed roads from July 1, 1878, to November 14, 1878, which, if taken at the rate of construction of last year, will be about one thousand miles; this at an average of but $50 per mile will swell the present cost to $9,490,000.

Since November 15, 1878, applications have been received for the establishment of service on twenty-five newly constructed roads. If service is to be established on new lines, and the usual readjustments made on other routes, the cost will be further increased.

It is thus definitely ascertained that in the ordinary and usual course of business, about $450,000 will be required to cover the cost of the service for the current year; nor can all of the service now in operation be continued without the additional appropriation.

Section 3679 Revised Statutes provides that "no Department of the Government shall expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations."

If no steps be taken by Congress to provide the appropriation necessary to cover the cost of the railroad service, I shall be constrained to regard such inaction as indicating that it is the will of Congress that the railroad service be reduced sufficiently to bring the cost thereof within the $9,100,000 appropriated for the current fiscal year.

It is made my duty by law to provide for the transportation of all mailable matter; and the law prescribes the rates to be paid for the mails carried by railroads according to the average weight carried per day. I have explained in my annual report that this Department can only exercise discretion in the expenditure for two items of railroad transportation, namely, the establishment of service on newly constructed roads, and the use of railway post-office cars.

I will therefore, in obedience to the section of law alluded to, cause the use of railway post-office cars and the allowance for the same to be discontinued on and after January 1, 1879.

In my opinion the discontinuance of the use of railway post-office cars would occasion great inconvenience to the public generally, as well as serious loss to the business interests of the country. It would also be a most disastrous blow to the postal system of the United States, and would in the end prove expensive to the Government, for it would require more to restore the postal-car service than would be saved by its discontinuance.

In view of the great importance of the postal service to the people, and to this Department, I have deemed it my duty, before taking conclusive action with regard to the matter, to again invite the attention of Congress to the subject.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The Postmaster-General has simply said to Congress through this letter now before us and which was before the Committee on Appropriations: "I have gone on and expended the money at the old rate with very small additions; and now, on the 1st day of December, I am confronted with this fact which I lay before you, that if you want me to go on giving all the people of this country the same postal facilities they have enjoyed since last July, you must give me $400,000 or $450,000 additional." But he puts no obligation on Congress to do this if it does not so choose. He says: "If you do not make this additional appropriation I shall take the balance of this fund which you gave me and shall make it run through to July 1, 1879; but in doing this I shall be obliged to pare down somewhat by withdrawing or limiting the postal-car service, so that in this respect the people of the United States will not have as great facilities of this kind as they now have."

There he leaves the question. Now, there is nothing minatory in that. He simply lays before us the situation and tells us what he will do if we do not make this appropriation. That is a fair statement of the situation.

Now, the gentleman reporting this bill says that the Postmaster-General ought not to have done this; that he ought to have notified Congress beforehand through the Committee on Appropriations that this appropriation would not be enough, and that he ought to have more. Sir, I do not know any better form of information for us or for my friends on the other side, or for the gentleman in charge of this bill, than for the head of a Department, after a careful study of its operations, to make up his figures of what he will need for the coming fiscal year. This is just what the Postmaster-General did last April when the gentleman from Georgia was laying the keel of the post-office appropriation bill for the present fiscal year.

In that statement the Postmaster-General makes his estimates in detail. Here they are; and I was interested and rather amused when the gentleman from Georgia came to read them to see how he took off more than $300,000 of those estimates by reducing a 7 per cent. increase to 3½ per cent., which existed only in his own mind.

Now, how does the Postmaster-General notify all of us what would be wanted for the present year? He estimates the cost of the service on the 31st of March, 1878, as $9,138,445.85. Then he gives the estimated increased weight on the great lines, a thing which must be paid under the law. Whenever there is an increase of even ten pounds a certain amount additional must be paid. The Postmaster-General has no discretion about this; $250,000 is the estimated increase for 1879, at 7 per cent. This is a part of the estimated increase which the Postmaster-General believed must be taken into account in appropriating for the postal service.

The total amount estimated by the Postmaster-General as necessary for the fiscal year was $9,635,269.20. The committee gave him for this service $9,100,000, so that we gave him $535,269.20 less than what he notified us he would need. Now he comes here and says that he will get along and keep this service going without reduction if we will give him $400,000 or $450,000, $100,000 or $150,000 less than what he before thought he would need.

Now, with that before us upon the record as the judgment of the Postmaster-General of what would be needed, I say it cannot be claimed here with justice or proper force that we had no monition of what the Department would need. We had ample warning upon this subject. Gentlemen may say (as I have heard them urge) that it was not stated what the money would be needed for, that it was not stated what would be the Postmaster-General's course.

Sir, I am informed in the Department (and I think the gentleman himself will not dispute this) that at the time when this bill was passed, in a conversation between the head of one of the bureaus of one of the Departments and the gentleman from Georgia, it was stated by the head of the bureau that if the Department went on at the then rate it would have to call for a deficiency; and it was plainly indicated in reply that the Department might go on at that rate, and that when Congress met it would be called upon to remedy the deficiency.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to say that the gentleman makes a statement which is untrue.

Mr. HALE. The statement which I have received from the Department?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. That of course is not an issue between the gentleman and myself. I dislike to raise any issue of this kind. I simply alluded to this matter, not thinking the gentleman would raise any question upon it. I hold here a letter from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, in which he says:

I deem it to be due to this Department to state that a few days after the adjournment of the last session of Congress Hon. J. H. BLOUNT called at my office, and in a conversation of considerable length that ensued, respecting the $9,100,000 appropriated for the railroad service for the current year, I stated that the said appropriation was certainly insufficient. Mr. BLOUNT replied——

I do not care about reading this further unless the gentleman from Georgia desires it.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman had better read the whole.

Mr. HALE. The letter continues:

Mr. BLOUNT replied that it was the intention to provide sufficient money to cover the cost of the railroad service, and that he would advise that the usual course of business be continued, and that no service be dispensed with or reduced because of the insufficiency of the appropriation, and that the matter be presented to Congress upon its reassembling.

Very respectfully, &c.,

THOMAS J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

I do not raise that issue. I do not care whether it happened or not. I only want the Department to stand right so it may be seen they were going on in the common course of business. That is what I have done, and that is what we are confronted with here now in this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is a disposition to complain of the magnitude of this postal-car service. I have not been a special friend of that service, but I do realize we are improving as we live, and that the American people will not go back to the old postal facilities or postal accommodation. We will never dispense or curtail the postal railway system. It stands to all the business of the Department and operates as a running stream of water operates as compared to a stagnant pool. It is a floating stream or streams all through the country, and facilitates post-office business and the delivering of the mails. You go back to the old stagnant stream (following my metaphor) and things will be done in the post-office, after the mails are delivered, slowly, and all the time of transportation will be lost. But we will never go back to that. Neither will we go back to any curtailment of this system. While the people have indicated already by the increase they will inevitably and always hold on to it, the Postmaster-General finds himself also confronted by a greater pressure upon this than perhaps any other branch of the service whatever. He is under pressure from business from the city, from the country, from the large and small, from the well-settled and sparsely settled community. He is under tremendous pressure from the newspapers, and we all know how natural it is to yield to that, and when the thing is going on he cannot stop. It is not given to any Postmaster-General to stop. All he can do is to keep on, as this letter I have read shows they continued in the usual course and then notified Congress. That is all we could expect them to do.

Now, this increase which has been put on the last year or two has not been put on out of any favoritism to railroad companies as I understand. So far as I can learn they care very little about this matter. The local superintendents, who want to run faster trains on the great trunk lines, would be glad to have it all taken off and thus they would make better time. There has always been more or less of that disposition, and the railroad interest is divided, but the people are interested on this question for large and constantly increasing mail facilities. In reference to this, of which so much complaint is made in a letter found on file directed to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] chairman of the subcommittee, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, in a letter dated December 12, 1878, which I now bring forward and will publish with my remarks, explains that out of this sum $100,337.27 were expended on the great trunk lines out of New York for increase of weight of mail-service. There was no responsibility in the Postmaster-General about that. When it increased he had to pay it. There were no new lines, no new railroads opened, but the wants of the country were growing.

The letter is as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., December 12, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following in response to your verbal inquiries of recent date:

The amount paid for the use of railway post-office cars on the 1st of July, 1876, was (in round numbers) $700,000.

The cost of the same items on the 1st of December, 1878, was $1,017,000.

This increase is over $300,000 for the two years and five months from July 1, 1876, to December 1, 1878, and the greater portion thereof went into operation about the first of January, 1878, and was obtained from the companies through the use of the $150,000 appropriated by Congress to obtain proper facilities from the great trunk lines of railroads.

Statements have not been made of the cost of this service on the 1st of July, 1877, and the 1st of July, 1878, but the figures given will probably furnish the information you desire.

The amount deducted from July 1, 1876, under the first section of the act of July 12, 1876, as given in the annual report for 1876 at $726,187, is believed to be approximately correct. The abatement under the thirteenth section, (on land grant roads,) therein given at $260,714, is not correct, as a great many roads to which it was applied were afterward shown to be exempt from such reductions.

The Postmaster-General issued an order authorizing the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to make the deductions required by act of July 12, 1876, and an accurate statement of the amount deducted can only be obtained through that office.

It is found that in order to arrive at the amount deducted under said act since that time, it would be necessary to make an analysis of the whole railroad adjustment since July 1, 1876. This of course is possible, but would require much time and labor.

The amount deducted under the act of June 17, 1878, from July 1, 1878, is about $400,000.

By deducting the cost of the railway post-office service, July 1, 1876, $700,000 (in round numbers) from the $2,495,296 not subject to abatement, the service under contract on that date is found to have been $1,795,676.

In the letter addressed to you April 8, 1878, the cost of the service under contract at that date is accurately stated at $838,280.05. Of this, $94,539.75 expired June 30, 1878, leaving under contract from July 1, 1878, $743,740.30; and all of this will expire on the 30th June, 1879, except $4,950.22.

Taking the $838,280.05 under contract April 8, 1878, from the $1,795,676 in operation on the 1st July, 1876, leaves a balance of $957,395.95, which represents the contract service which expired on the 30th June, 1877.

These amounts are correct, with the exception of a few cases, say five or six, in which the contracts were annulled for special reasons.

In the States in which the contract term commenced July 1, 1878, namely, Kansas, Nebraska, California, Colorado, Nevada, the Territories, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas, the aggregate pay from July 1, 1878, is $1,413,094.48, which is $224,978.95 less than would have been paid had it not been for the reduction of July 12, 1876, and June 17, 1878. Of the last named sum, $155,157.90 is attributable to the act of June 17, 1878.

The cost of the railroad service as shown by adjustments made to 31st July, 1878, $9,451,159; as shown by adjustments to 31st August, 1878, $9,242,823; as shown by adjustments to 30th September, 1878, $9,250,756; as shown by adjustments to 31st October, 1878, $9,278,321; as shown by adjustments to 30th November, 1878, $9,402,602. Amount which will be due 31st December out of special appropriation is the sum of $38,000.

These statements of the cost of the service, at the close of each month, show the amount authorized to be paid by orders issued, without reference to the period covered by the order. For instance, the increase for October and November goes back to the 1st July, 1878; likewise the decrease in August. Of increase reported in October, $4,087.50 takes effect from November 1, 1875; $15,144.62 May 5, 1877, to June 30, 1877; $41,998.96 is from July 1, 1877.

Very respectfully,

THOS. J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. J. H. BLOUNT,
House of Representatives.

It is a singular thing at the time the gentleman refers to as a general paralysis of business—and it is an interesting fact, Mr. Chairman, to be looked at when we are studying, as we are, all the laws and rules and operations of business—at the present time it is an interesting thing to find all this time the mails were increasing, that the business of the country in certain directions was increasing, that the weight all the time was telling up by tens and hundreds of tons; but the law was pitiless and the Postmaster-General must pay out of the fund which he received from Congress. And that is another reason or one of the great reasons why he is here.

The system, the gentleman says, is a magnificent one. So it is in many respects. This is a magnificent country, having a population of forty-five millions, a postal business which is immense. Forty-seven millions of population, my friend from Indiana says. Perhaps the next census will show that. But there is nothing about the system which is luxurious, nothing overexpensive. The cars are neat and well arranged and well adapted. The men upon them do not get overpay; they do not have short hours or short days of labor. They are, as any man will have seen who has ever been in a postal car and noticed what was going on, wonderfully adapted to their line of business. It is perhaps a magnificent system, but it is not a uselessly expending money system. It is what the people have got used to and what they cannot go back from.

My throat is troubling me so much, Mr. Chairman, that I will conclude by saying that I believe what the Postmaster-General has done is right, and that it is our duty to follow in the direction of his estimate. He simply says that if you do not authorize him to do so he will not continue the service for the balance of the fiscal year as it has gone on for the six months already past; and that is certainly not a heinous offense.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to add but very little to the remarks made by my friend from Maine. The gentleman from Georgia undertakes to blame—I will use a mild word—the Department for not giving Congress and the committee sufficient information at the time these appropriations were made. I affirm, Mr. Chairman, that if the gentleman did not know he ought to have known, and our committee ought to have known, that the postal-car service existed substantially as it exists to-day at the time we made the appropriation. The Department estimated the total cost of maintaining the railway mail service, less the 5 per cent. of deduction on their pay, at $9,729,000. We gave them $9,225,000. I include in that the $125,000 for extra mail service. This shows that the appropriation we then made was $504,000 less than the Department estimated that they would need. It seems that my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] was seeking information during this time, and on the 8th of April the letter to which my friend from Maine has referred makes an elaborate statement to him as to the exact cost of this service which he now complains that he knew nothing of. In this they revised their estimates in the interest of economy, and they put the total needs of the service at $9,635,000. Had we given it, this appropriation, which we are making to-day would not have been needed.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that all the information that a Department could give was given to our committee and to the gentleman from Georgia at the time this appropriation was made.

Mr. BLOUNT. Now I wish to say, if the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him——

Mr. FOSTER. I am willing to be interrupted.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to say that the "estimated increase on the great lines, now weighing, for increased weight and railroad post-office cars" was $250,000. That is all the increase there is.

Mr. FOSTER. I referred to the letter dated April 8, 1878.

Mr. BLOUNT. It is from that I read.

Mr. FOSTER. Now let me refer to another point. The gentleman said he did not know the railway postal-car service existed at the time this appropriation was made. I cannot say whether he knew or not, but I affirm again that the postal-car service existed substantially as it exists to-day when this appropriation was made, and for three or four months prior thereto, namely, on the 1st day of January, 1878. The gentleman claims that he is unable to find what the increase of cost has been—I mean the increase of cost of the postal-car service. Here it is. In a letter to him it is stated that in July, 1876 it cost $700,000, and on the 1st day of December, 1878 it cost $1,000,000; an increase not of 45 per cent. per annum, but 18 per cent. per annum.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman not know that it is not a correct calculation to put it at two years when most of the increase has been put on since the 1st of January, 1878?

Mr. FOSTER. The letter goes on then further to explain exactly how it occurred and when it occurred. Now it seems to me if there has been any dereliction of duty anywhere that dereliction rests upon this House, and especially on our Committee on Appropriations; and I take my share of the blame because, as the gentleman says, the republican members of the committee agreed to the bill. But I confess this was a matter I did not investigate at the time. But on the other hand, instead of my friend from Georgia censuring the Department, I think we ought to give them a vote of thanks for maintaining throughout the country the splendid mail facilities they are now giving us.

I can only account for this thing on one single theory, and that is the theory of "economy" which has controlled my friend from Georgia and the Committee on Appropriations for the last three or four years. We ought to have known that we would have to make this deficiency; we ought to have known it then. If I am not mistaken I predicted it; I am not quite sure about that.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman is mistaken; he was delighted with the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not sure but I predicted it; I predicted it in many other cases I know. And this is only of a piece with the general habit of this committee upon appropriations in the "interest of economy" to reduce these appropriations to such an extent that they will require in the following year to make them up by a deficiency. They hoped in some way or other the Post-Office Department might get along; but they could not; and here we are to-day confronted with this deficiency, which I say if the Committee on Appropriations had done their duty we would not have been confronted with.

Mr. HALE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not know but this discussion, practically, is a vain one. The gentleman from Georgia who has charge of the bill I understand is in favor of its passage; gentlemen who report bills usually are in favor of them; but to hear the gentleman's speech one would suppose he was against the passage of this bill. Now, if it be true that this postal mail service is improper, then this deficiency bill ought not to pass. If it is too large, then it ought to be cut down here and now.

The time has come when it can be cut down and must be cut down unless we furnish the money to carry it on.

Now, then, it may be that wise legislation could be had by which smaller compensation would be given to the railways for this service. I do not say that it could be had. I say it may be so. But, for one, I am satisfied that the postal service cannot be curtailed without inflicting great injury upon the country, and I think the gentleman from Georgia himself is so satisfied, otherwise he would recommend the withholding of the money.

Now, the gentleman speaks of this service as a magnificent service: so it is magnificent in its efficiency and in its promptness; and after all, every kind of business that is done efficiently and promptly everywhere is ordinarily done profitably to everybody connected with it; you may take the history of the Post-Office Department for twenty years and you will find that at least since 1859 and 1860 it has been constantly improving in efficiency and promptness, and that the revenues from the Department have been constantly increasing as compared with the service that has been performed and the expenditures.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. How about the deficiencies?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The deficiency also has been constantly decreasing. I recollect calling the attention of the House a year or two ago to this fact, that in 1860 the revenues of the Department were, in bound numbers, $8,000,000 and the expenditures of the Department were, say, $19,000,000, a deficiency of $11,000,000 for that year, and for the years 1859 and 1860 of $15,000,000. In 1861, 1862, and 1863 the revenues increased as compared with the expenditures. In 1864 and 1865, if I recollect properly, or in one of those years, the revenues were absolutely more than the expenditures by nearly a million of dollars, arising no doubt from the fact that the mail-service was restricted to the more thickly-settled portions of the country, North and West. With the close of the war came the extension of mail facilities South as well as more generally over the West. The expenditures increased and there grew gradually a difference between the expenditures and the revenue, the deficiency slightly increasing, and substantially there has been a slight increase in that respect from that time to the present, arising from the increase of the non-paying mail service, especially in the South.

Now, then, this postal-car service in its greatest efficiency is to be found North and West more than South. I have no doubt that it ought to be extended South as fast as the country demands it, and also farther West as fast as it is demanded.

With this great expenditure for postal-car service, this fact is true: that where it is most perfect you there get a surplus revenue to the Department. In New England, New York, and Pennsylvania you get it. In Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois the revenues are substantially equal to the expenditures. And I am satisfied the true policy is to give every dollar that is required to keep this service as efficient as it is, and to increase that efficiency just so far as it is profitable and the wants of the people require; for convenience and profit go together.

This being the fact, I do not think this appropriation ought to be made grudgingly. This being a good and efficient service, I for one feel like saying so and voting this money cheerfully and heartily, and giving credit to the Department where credit is due.

Mr. HALE. I now yield for a moment to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. PHILLIPS.]

Mr. PHILLIPS. I shall at the proper time move to strike out the proviso to this deficiency bill. It is a deficiency bill for this current fiscal year for the transportation of mails by railroad. As the gentleman from Georgia has stated, the increase amounts to a certain percentage per annum. I think he said the increase of the postal service was 45 per cent. per annum. We all know that there has been a great and valuable increase in this service, and I cannot see why the gentleman from Georgia should couple with this appropriation a provision that there shall be no increase in the service in the seven remaining months of this year, for which this bill provides.

I hope that the House will strike out this proviso and leave the Postmaster-General to use the fund for the increase of service if the public interests require it. I shall make that motion when we come to consider the bill by sections.

Mr. HALE. I now yield the floor, as I do not desire to occupy further time.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine says that we have voted the money the Department wants, and he cannot see why the Postmaster-General is assailed except to indulge in the privilege of grumbling. The same idea was presented in another form by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] when he talked of these continuing deficiencies that we hear of.

The remarks of the gentleman are always general, because an attempt to particularize would disclose their weakness and show that so far from his being a great prophet he did not understand the bill before the House, at least this particular bill. The gentleman also fails to state that in this very matter of postal railway service there was a reduction, assented to by himself as reasonable, of 10 per cent., and another of 5 per cent., making in all a reduction of 15 per cent. in the cost of the postal railway service, which neither the gentleman nor any of his political friends ever saw any occasion for until it was suggested by somebody else. I might take up the various appropriation bills with their details and disclose the very same fact, that reductions have occurred and always occurred in this way.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] says that we were informed in a letter of April 8, 1878, that 7 per cent. increase was what they wanted. We were likewise informed two years ago by the Postmaster-General that they wanted 10 per cent. increase in the postal railway service. The then Postmaster-General, now the First Assistant Postmaster-General, and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, upon examination before our committee, admitted that the estimate sent in here by them was wrong; but they never admitted it until the calculation was made, and then a reduction of $1,000,000 was agreed to by the parties. The Committee on Appropriations in considering this question in this way have done what they did two years ago, and correctly on both occasions.

Mr. FOSTER. And had a deficiency both times.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman is mistaken as to the cost of the railway service; and when the gentleman comes to talk about deficiencies he does not tell all. The largest item of increase in the deficiency bill of last year was a deficiency in appropriations made before the democratic party had control of this House. It is idle to talk about these deficiencies, and it is unfair to present them in the way in which the gentleman sees fit to present them.

I say, therefore, that in making this estimate of 3½ per cent. we had due regard to the service as it was in the past. The postal-car service has been increased without any information being given to this House. There is not a gentleman on the Committee on Appropriations who will undertake to say that he had any idea of this postal-car service.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] now reads from a letter in which the Department refers to the cost of the railway service in 1876 as $700,000, and gives it now as $1,017,000. They can give the exact cost of the postal railway service for every month and every quarter in the year. Why could they not have ascertained the cost of the service at any given time? It is to enable the gentleman to do what he does, to state that this is an increase over the past two and a half years, when their own private statements show it nearly all commenced after the 1st of January, 1878.

Mr. SPARKS. Do I understand the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] to say that there has been an increase of this postal railway service since the appropriation for the present fiscal year was made, or an increase beyond that contemplated by the appropriation?

Mr. BLOUNT. I say there has been a large increase in the postal railway service for the last year, of which this House has not been informed, thereby creating a deficiency for the year. While we made calculations on the idea that the service was year by year being carried on upon the basis of 1873, we find upon investigation that there has been an increase at the rate of 45 per cent.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman will pardon me. The understanding I had of it (perhaps I am incorrect) was that an appropriation was made for this postal railway service as now run; that appropriation was not sufficient to run the same sort of service through the year, and they now ask this appropriation as a deficiency to carry the service through the year. I understand the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] to say that that construction of it is not correct.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not mean to say that. Before I get through I will explain what I mean. A witness is brought forward here in the person of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. A letter is read in which he says:

> I deem it to be due to this Department to state that a few days after the adjournment of the last session of Congress Hon. J. H. BLOUNT called at my office, and in a conversation of considerable length that ensued respecting the $9,000,000 appropriated for the railroad service for the current year, I stated that the said appropriation was certainly insufficient. Mr. BLOUNT replied that it was the intention to provide sufficient money to cover the cost of the railroad service, and that he would advise that the usual course of business be continued and that no service be dispensed with or reduced because of the insufficiency of the appropriation.

Now, I regret very much that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General should attempt to state a conversation which occurred between us at the adjournment or just about the time of the adjournment of the last session of Congress. The actual fact is that he and I had very little to say in reference to the postal railway service. With the understanding of that service which I received growing out of that interview, I said to him, if you have not money enough I would not stop the railway service.

Now, in the first place there is just semblance enough of truth in the statement to enable him to say that it is true at all. I stepped into the Post-Office just before going home and asked for some star service to be put on in my State. I had had a previous conversation with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General in which he had said to me that he would get along with the amount appropriated. Afterward he thought he could hardly do so. Our appropriation being something over $9,000,000, he thought he might run over that amount somewhat. I said to him that if he did so it could not be helped. The only idea I had in my mind and the only one I supposed he could take from my remark was that the service, as I understood it, as gathered from his report and all the other avenues of information open to us, had simply experienced an increase in accordance with the increase of prior years; and not until I came back here did I understand that the service had been increased in this way.

Now, sir, the attempt to take up a careless conversation, not extending over two minutes, an unpremeditated conversation following a simple request for an increase of star service—to take up such a conversation and bring it in here in the form of an official paper to sustain the conduct of the Department in this respect is, to say the least, indelicate.

Mr. FOSTER. They rather took you at a disadvantage when you were asking an increase of service.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, sir, I have seen this House taken advantage of in that way. Gentlemen have told me that their star service had been stricken off mile after mile just as Congress assembled. I have thus seen pressure brought to bear on members here to make them vote away hundreds of thousands of dollars for this service. In 1876, after this had been done, it turned out to be a fact that while the railway service had been increased the star service had been decreased in the very quarters that gentlemen had been complaining of.

Why, sir, in an interview with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, as published the other day in the Post, the intimation is thrown out that if the Department should be obstructed in the exercise of its inclination in reference to the railway service, the star service should have another blow.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman pretend to say that he was "bulldozed" by that statement?

Mr. BLOUNT. Not at all. I trust that I correctly understand the allusion as being mere jesting. The gentleman I presume does not suppose me capable of agreeing to a thing of this sort for any such reason. I think, if the gentleman is serious, it is about time he should stop those intimations. He has indulged largely in that business in this House with very little effect.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine refers to this letter of April 8 to say that we were notified there was to be an increase. Why, sir, of course we were. The increase is at the rate of hundreds of thousands a year; our bill was based on that increase. But there was a failure to disclose this large increase of the postal-car service.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] says he is surprised that I could agree to report this bill and then make a speech indicating my opposition to it. Sir, the gentleman misunderstands me. However unacceptable it may be to the Department and its friends in this House, I shall not hesitate, whenever I think there has been an improper administration of this Government in any one of its Departments, to communicate that information to this House.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] says that the money has not all been spent. Why, sir, who undertook to say that it had been? But there has been such an amount of money spent that the Department says to us to-day, "Give us a deficiency appropriation or the postal-car service must be not merely reduced but almost destroyed." The Postmaster-General tells us this appropriation must be made right away. He has delayed communicating this information until now, and he cannot wait until January. The appropriation must be pressed at this hour. It is for this reason we have been disposed to yield in this regard and to allow the service to be increased.

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Chairman, I feel that in justice to myself and the other gentlemen who composed the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations having charge of the post-office appropriation bill, I should make the statement that no bill before the committee at the last session of Congress was more carefully and patiently considered, not only by the gentleman from Georgia, who had it especially in charge, but also by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] and myself. We endeavored to get all possible light upon the subject; and one of the items of appropriation which most engaged our attention was this one for the railway mail service of the country. Now I say here (and in this statement I shall be corroborated not only by the gentleman who was chairman of the subcommittee, but also by the gentleman from Indiana to whom I appeal) that never during our long deliberations had we any data which seemed to require us to make the appropriation for a larger sum than that provided by the bill. The only data we had to guide us in determining the amount were: first, the general estimates of the Department, and next, a statement of the cost of that service for the first two quarters of the then current fiscal year. Basing our proposed appropriation upon the cost of the service for those two quarters, we considered the amount named amply sufficient. We had no account of the last two quarters, commencing on the 1st of January and ending on the 30th of June, 1878; but we had a right to suppose that during them there would be no more than the natural increase, and that we might safely base our expenditures upon what the service had cost us for the first two quarters. We did that. We made deductions of the 10 and the 5 per cent. We did not allow the full increase asked for by the Department, which was 7 per cent. We adopted 3½ per cent. as our basis, which was the amount of the average increase from year to year during a long series of years; and I know that it was the unanimous judgment and thorough conviction of the subcommittee that what we appropriated would not only be just but ample in amount. I am compelled to conclude that there was concealment on the part of the Department. We never were told that there had been an enormous increase in the cost of this service subsequent to the 1st of January, 1878.

For what reason? Why were we not told this large increase of cost was made subsequently to this period? I do not understand, and I assert that, having due regard for the public service and for the public convenience, had we been so informed—speaking for myself and I believe for the other members of the subcommittee—we would have made an appropriation to meet that increased service. We were not informed of it, and I appeal to my friend from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER,] if he is in his seat, whether what I say is not exactly the truth. Therefore, not having been informed of the increase, we had as good a right to judge of the needs of the service, the information being based on its former cost, as had the Department itself.

Sir, it is not a pleasant thing for me to receive a sort of indirect lecture from the head of this Department as to our duties. The House will bear me witness I have always endeavored to deal justly and even generously with the Departments in making appropriations, being always willing to appropriate what the necessities of the case demand. But as we were not informed of the large increase made subsequently to January, 1878, my friend from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] agreeing it was increased 18 per cent., the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] alleging it was 45 per cent, no matter which is correct, it was an abnormal increase of which we were not informed, of which we could have no knowledge. Hence, sir, I hold either the Postmaster-General himself or his assistants derelict in duty for not informing this House through the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations what were the absolute needs of the service.

Now, it may be, the cost having been increased so abnormally, they shrank from giving the information which might have caused us then and there to put a stop to any further increase at a time when it might have been done without any great inconvenience to the Department or the service generally.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] charges this insufficient appropriation as one of our "pretended" economies. Ay, sir, if it had not been for these pretended economies, but really these successful economies, on the part of the democratic party as represented upon the floor of this House there would be to-day a deficiency in the Treasury of the United States which would have to be made up by increase of taxation or the negotiation of a new loan. And it is only because from year to year we have not only attempted economy but enforced economy that the Treasury to-day is able to meet all the demands upon it.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] has not failed on this occasion, as he has not failed on many other former occasions, to sneer at any economy enforced by the majority on this floor. Mr. Chairman, in the Thirty-ninth Congress there were appropriated for the purposes of this Government, outside of the permanent appropriations, the sum of $312,000,000. In the Fortieth Congress there were appropriated $322,000,000, an increase of $10,000,000 in the Fortieth over the Thirty-ninth Congress. In the Forty-first Congress there were appropriated $336,000,000, an increase of $14,000,000 in the Forty-first over the Fortieth Congress.

In the Forty-second Congress, when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] was first chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the amount appropriated, in the great appropriation bills and for deficiencies and all the miscellaneous items going to the support of the Government, was $369,000,000, an increase of $33,000,000 over the amount appropriated in the Forty-first Congress.

Now, again, in the Forty-third Congress, embracing 1875–'76, the whole amount appropriated for the support of the Government was $361,000,000, being but $9,000,000 less than was appropriated in the Forty-second Congress. The decrease was made at the second session of that Congress. In October, 1874, a political whirlwind had passed over this land, sweeping the republican party from power in this House. It was the warning contained in that great political verdict which induced a reduction of $7,000,000 in the appropriations for the fiscal year of 1876. But even in that Congress the total appropriations were $361,000,000.

Now, sir, mark the change when these "pretended" attempts at economy were inaugurated. In the Forty-fourth Congress, the first time since the war that the democratic party regulated and legislated for the expenditures of this Government, the total appropriations for that Congress amounted to but $307,000,000, or more than $60,000,000 less as compared with those made by the republican party in the Forty-second Congress and more than $50,000,000 less than those made by the same party in the Forty-third Congress. And on this side of the House at the last session we made appropriations for the running fiscal year amounting to $158,000,000; but as is well known there were extraordinary expenses included—the fishery award, $5,500,000; the deficiencies in the Navy Department, amounting to between three and four million dollars; some eight and one-half millions of dollars necessary to pay the pensions due to soldiers of the war of 1812, which had not been paid for years; and besides there were other items amounting to nearly $12,000,000, which in justice should be deducted from the gross sum appropriated for the running fiscal year—but assuming it to be $158,000,000, and multiplying that by two so as to get the aggregate appropriations for the Forty-fifth Congress, you have $317,546,000. I ask you to compare that amount with the sums appropriated for the Forty-second and Forty-third Congresses and you have the result of the "pretended" economies, if you choose to style them so, but economies which this side of the House have carried through and which have proved to be not "pretended" but actual and resulting in that amount of saving to the people of the United States.

These figures I have drawn from undoubted sources, from the appropriation bills themselves; and as no cent of money may be expended in this Government without warrant of law, it is to them you go to know what is the cost of this Government outside of the permanent appropriations. And thus it is, sir, that there has been an average saving to this Government and to its people by these "pretended" economies of hard on to thirty millions of dollars a year, without which, sir, the Treasury of the Government would have been bankrupt.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to ask the gentleman a question before he sits down. In making up the estimate of the expenses of the Government for the years he has named, I know he intends to be exactly correct and fair, and I want him to take into that account the fact that we are now paying between fifty and sixty millions of dollars less a year for interest than in some of the years to which he has referred.

Mr. CLYMER. In my estimates, I will state to my friend, the question of interest on the public debt does not enter. It is one of the permanent appropriations. It is once estimated for and enters into no calculation on this subject.

Mr. PRICE. It is part of the expenses of the Government.

Mr. CLYMER. No, sir; not in the sense in which I have made the comparison. The interest paid by the Government does not come into my figures because I have only taken the appropriations made by regular appropriation bills and for the ordinary expenses of the Government. My friend from Iowa knows that the interest on the public debt is not appropriated. It is a permanent appropriation paid out by warrant of law.

Mr. PRICE. But it is a part of the expenses of the Government.

Mr. CLYMER. Unquestionably.

Mr. PRICE. And you will agree with me, the interest on the public debt has been reduced by the republican administration nearly sixty millions of dollars.

Mr. CLYMER. I do not know that that is much to its credit. I know that that reduction has been made by means of heavy taxation on the people. But the interest on the public debt does not enter into this calculation at all.

Mr. PRICE. That may be true as far as the figures of the gentleman are concerned, but it is a fact nevertheless.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLYMER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER.]

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman from Ohio will allow me, I will move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. FOSTER. I would rather go on now. I will not occupy more than five minutes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 3312) making appropriation for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 5485) for the relief of Andrew Muckle.

POST-OFFICE DEFICIENCY BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not see exactly how the gentleman from Pennsylvania got into this debate in the way he has. But he is generally very fair, and when the gentleman from Pennsylvania states that the democratic party has reduced the expenses of the Government $30,000,000 annually, I am amazed. I hold in my hand a report of the Secretary of the Treasury which shows that the reduction of the expenses of the Government after the books were posted and the year closed for the year 1876–'77 was a little over $19,000,000. The first year, then, of democratic economy resulted in a showing of a reduction over the previous year of $19,000,000. The second year shows a reduction over the preceding year of $1,695,000. The present year, the current fiscal year, will show at its close an increase again probably of from two to four millions of dollars. Now my friend gets into a confusion in regard to these appropriation bills.

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman will allow me I will ask him a question.

Mr. FOSTER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ATKINS. Is the gentleman referring to expenditures or appropriations?

Mr. FOSTER. To expenditures, and I maintain that is the place to look in order to see where your decrease of expenses is.

Mr. ATKINS. Congress has nothing to do with expenditures at all.

Mr. FOSTER. In the Forty-fifth Congress what was the action of the Committee on Appropriations and of this House usually on appropriation bills? We ransacked all the Departments, and wherever we found an unexpended balance we appropriated the unexpended balance without giving any figures whatever; and that, of course, did not appear and does not appear in my friend's quotings at all. There were several millions of that. But it was an appropriation of money actually. That, however, I will say to my friend from Pennsylvania, does not appear at all in the appropriation bills.

Then, again, under republican administrations the appropriations were made liberally, so that all the Departments had sufficient money to run them, so to speak.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. They had!

Mr. FOSTER. At the close of each year there was a large sum of money to be turned back into the Treasury—several million dollars. On the other hand, when our democratic friends came in they appropriated too little, and then they bring here deficiency bills to the extent of $18,000,000 in two years, while my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in four years brought in deficiency bills of only about $10,000,000. The actual fact, as contained in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, is that in the two years which have elapsed the actual reduction of the expenses of this Government for the two years is a little over $20,000,000. Two years preceding this, under a republican administration, we reduced from former years $26,000,000, and it is unfair in my friend to say that the republican party would not have continued the reduction which they had commenced before the Democratic party came into power.

Now, I say that there are no figures on earth except in the head of some democrat who has been on this Committee on Appropriations that will justify any such assertion as the gentleman from Pennsylvania makes.

Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentleman say that the party to which he belongs attempted to make reductions?

Mr. FOSTER. They made reductions every year except one.

Mr. CLYMER. In 1869 the appropriations were one hundred and sixty-seven millions.

Mr. FOSTER. That is not a fair way to get at it. Take the actual expenses.

Mr. CLYMER. All the money appropriated by law.

Mr. FOSTER. No; take the actual expenses.

Mr. CLYMER. You have not decreased the appropriations one year since 1869.

Mr. FOSTER. There was a decrease in the expenditures in every year from 1867, save one, down to the time you came in, and the books of the Treasury Department will show it, and I maintain that the basis on which my friend goes is not a correct one. It is the actual expenditures when the books are posted at the close of the year that show whether there has been a reduction or an increase.

Mr. CLYMER. Can there be a dollar expended in this Government save by appropriations? Will the gentleman answer me that question?

Mr. FOSTER. Money can be appropriated and not expended.

Mr. CLYMER. But you cannot expend it without an appropriation, and I have shown that you never decreased an appropriation bill save in 1876 since 1869, and that on the contrary you have increased the appropriations by millions each Congress since.

Mr. FOSTER. I maintain that the expenses of carrying on the Government have decreased each year since 1867, save one. Does the gentleman deny that?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I deny it, and I will give the gentleman figures to prove it. Will he have them now?

Mr. FOSTER. I will take them now.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I hold in my hand the finance report, which is the official publication of the Treasury Department. You have all seen it, and I take the gentleman at his word, that the expenditures are the true test of economy, and not the appropriations.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. In the year 1871 the expenditures, omitting odd thousands, were $157,000,000; in 1872 they were $153,000,000.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman must be reading wrong.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am reading from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1877, on page 17 of the Appendix.

Mr. FOSTER. The expenditures were more than that.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. In 1872 the net expenditures, excluding interest as before, were $153,000,000; in 1873 the republican Congress raised them to $180,000,000, and in 1874 they raised them to $194,000,000——

Mr. FOSTER. And now they are $236,000,000.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. No, not exclusive of interest on the debt, which is an item not subject to discretion; but the gentleman will allow me to go on. He must be patient. In 1875 the expenditures were $171,000,000; in 1876, the last republican Congress, they were nearly $165,000,000. Then came the democratic era of economy, and next year, 1877, the expenditures were $144,000,000, being a reduction of over $20,000,000 in one year, and that reduction is still going on.

The appropriation bills of this session will fall below $140,000,000, and the expenditures ought to be considerably below that amount. Comparing the average rate of expenditures under the Forty-second and Forty-third Congresses with that under the Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth Congresses, I think I am quite within bounds in saying that we have reduced the net ordinary expenditures of the Government fully 20 per cent., and have done this in spite of the accumulated deficiencies arising out of the lawless manner in which the public money was recklessly squandered under the late administration, inherited deficiencies for which we have had to provide, and which are extinguished forever.

I fully understand and appreciate the remark of the gentleman from Ohio that his party when in power gave the Departments plenty of money, and they had so much that they paid some of it back into the Treasury. Did the Navy Department pay back anything into the Treasury? He admits that his colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD,] when chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, brought in deficiency bills for $12,000,000.

Mr. FOSTER. In four years.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. And he says that this side of the House has had to bring in deficiency appropriation bills for $18,000,000. Let me tell the gentleman that if the Committee on Appropriations on his side of the House had brought in all the deficiencies which the republican administration created in defiance of law, then our side of the House might greatly have reduced our deficiency bills, for the chief items in them have been due to the necessity of making up deficiencies incurred by a republican Congress. Now, does the gentleman from Ohio deny the truth of these figures?

Mr. FOSTER. You have just proven what I stated by reading the figures.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I have shown a steady increase in the ordinary expenditures from 1873 to 1875.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not wish to consume the time of the House any longer. I maintain to-day what I have always maintained. I trust my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER,] who is usually so fair, will examine into the question upon the test that I gave. I claim that the test is expenditures and not appropriations.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Let me give the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] one or two more figures. I find that the deficiency bill passed by the Forty-third Congress, a republican body, was for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, in round numbers, $1,700,000, and for the year ending June 30, 1874, $11,278,000, making about $13,000,000 directly appropriated by that Congress to cover the deficiencies in the appropriations made by the Forty-second, when there was an apparent decrease of expenditures.

Mr. FOSTER. I emphatically and distinctly deny the correctness of the gentleman's statement.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman need not deny it; here it is in the book.

Mr. FOSTER. I deny the correctness of the statements the gentleman has made.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. They were for deficiencies in the appropriations made by those Congresses.

Mr. FOSTER. Not for former Congresses; but they were such as you and your friends made up and charged to the republican party; and they are not true.

Mr. ATKINS, (holding up a book.) This is made up by the Clerk of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. He is a full-blooded democrat. [Laughter.]

Mr. ATKINS. And by the Secretary of the Senate. Is he a democrat? [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSTER. I can show the incorrectness of the statements by the gentleman from New York himself, if he would look at them.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman has got cornered and he is begging the question.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. It is not fair for more than one man to attack the gentleman from Ohio at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Mr. FOSTER. I have stirred up such a hornets' nest on the other side that perhaps debate had better be closed.

Mr. DURHAM. I think the gentleman has himself got worse stung than we have.

Mr. FOSTER. There have been more of you stung, at any rate, than on this side of the House.

I want to conclude by this simple statement: that in my judgment, and I do not want to impugn my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] who is usually so fair by anything I am going to say, there never was a greater fraud perpetrated and maintained by any party in this country than the fraudulent democratic claim that that party reduced the expenditures of this Government $30,000,000 a year.

Mr. CLYMER. I am surprised to hear my friend from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] use language that would be scarcely reputable on the stump, accusing gentlemen upon this side of the House of fraud, in making a statement based upon figures which he is not able to deny, and which will stand against his simple negation. This is not language which I think should characterize the intercourse here of one gentleman with another. I have certainly intended to say nothing here which would justify the gentleman in using any such language. If he chooses on the stump to make assertions of that kind he can do it. He should not do it, however, among his peers, where the question can be examined and investigated. And there I am willing to rest it. I move now that the committee rise.

Mr. BURCHARD. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to reply to the lecture which I have received.

Mr. CLYMER. I will withdraw it for the lecture.

Mr. FOSTER. I certainly did not intend to be discourteous to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] or to the democratic party, and if I have said anything inoffensive I withdraw it. [Great laughter.] Offensive, I mean.

Mr. CLYMER. It was innocuous.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to assure my friend that when I made such a statement as I did the provocation was very great, and I used the language which he refers to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the committee now rise to close debate.

Mr. BURCHARD. A moment. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] had gone back two or three years instead of beginning where he did——

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes; back to the war.

Mr. BURCHARD. He would have found that there had been a decrease of expenditures as stated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER.] If he had read the statement of expenditures for 1867 and 1868 he would have found that there was a larger expenditure for those years, after the close of the war, than for any year since that time, and that after that time there was a diminution until the expenditures were brought down to $153,000,000. Then there was an increase, as the gentleman states; but he commenced at a time when there was an increase. I think that if he had made a fair statement he would have begun at the time to which the gentleman from Ohio has referred.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] will listen a moment, and if he will allow the stenographer to state the year with which I began, he will find that I began with the year 1871, recording an expenditure of $157,000,000; and then I referred to 1872, recording an expenditure of $153,000,000. I did this in order to show that the gentleman's friends having in charge the administration of the Government started out with most excellent intentions, being admonished by the state of public opinion that they must reduce expenditures. They had, in fact, a sudden spasm of economy. But they very soon forgot their good intentions, and the very next year the expenditures went up from $153,000,000 to $180,000,000, and I believe the gentleman from Illinois was one of the members of this House who voted in favor of these increased appropriations.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to tell the gentleman how this increase arose.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing all general debate. There was an agreement with the gentleman having charge of the Geneva award bill that we should make this debate as short as possible.

The motion of Mr. BLOUNT was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 5682) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for the transportation of mails by railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that all general debate in the Committee of the Whole on the postal deficiency appropriation bill be closed in one minute after the Committee of the Whole shall resume its session.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the pending bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. CARLISLE in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5682) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for the transportation of mails by railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask that the bill be now read for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $450,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to meet the deficiency in the appropriation for the transportation of mails by railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879: Provided, that no increase in the postal-car service beyond what existed on the 1st of December, 1878, shall be made during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move to amend by striking out the proviso, which is of no use and may be mischievous.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope this amendment will not prevail. It is not necessary for me to take up time in stating again the reasons for inserting the proviso. It was adopted with the unanimous assent of the Committee on Appropriations, and I hope it will not be stricken out.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Does the gentleman think the proviso as it now stands may not work some mischief to the service?

Mr. BLOUNT. I cannot see where the mischief will come.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PHILLIPS] I desire to say a word. In the first place, the proviso seems to me an improper limitation to be imposed in a bill of this kind upon the authority of the postal department of this Government. I feel satisfied that many gentlemen of this House are, in respect to this matter, in a situation somewhat similar to my own. I have the honor to represent a portion of the oil region of Pennsylvania, in which, as gentlemen here are aware, there has been a very large increase of business and population within the last few years. In one county of my State the population has more than doubled within three years past. Within that time a "four corners" has come to be a city of ten thousand inhabitants; and upon every by-way, where but a few years ago if men were seen at all they were drawing saw-logs or cleaning fields, you will find to-day a teeming population interested in this great question.

Yet I find that the Post-Office Department has no authority to give that people the relief they require. To an application made last summer there came a reply that there was a deficiency; that the postal-car service of the country was so extensive that the amount of the appropriation was insufficient to keep it in operation. My application in behalf of the people of that county to have postal cars placed upon two railroads which have been built within the last year, and which are now doing so much business that I am told they will pay the cost of their construction within one year—that application was refused, and those people are deprived of that service on account of this policy which is called "economy," I suppose, by our friends on the other side. Sir, from that kind of economy deliver me.

This matter has met me in more than one direction, as the representative of the people of my district. I am not in accord with the gentleman from Georgia in his recollection with reference to the matter of the postal service of the country. Sir, that gentleman and this House had notice of a deficiency in this regard long before the adjournment of the last session. A proposition was made early in the session to increase the appropriation for this purpose, and it was refused. I voted for that increase as did many other gentlemen who had been embarrassed like myself in this respect. Yet it is claimed, as I understand, that the gentleman was not aware of this deficiency.

Sir, we are a progressive people; and this proviso proceeds upon the idea that there is no progress in this country. Notwithstanding the great financial crash of 1873, we are to-day building railroads at the rate of two thousand miles and more per annum; yet this proviso says that there shall be no increase of the postal-car service. Do gentlemen of this House desire to be placed on the record in that attitude? Do they desire to deprive the people of any increase in that direction? Why, sir, read the proviso. It is as follows:

Provided, That no increase in the postal-car service beyond what existed on the 1st day of December, 1878, shall be made during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879.

The two railroads to which I have referred traverse a territory of nearly fifty miles. They are narrow-gauge railroads. Upon them are numerous cities, as they are called, which have grown up in that oil region, of some three or four thousand people each.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. REED. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the gentleman from Maine, but I presume I have said enough to be understood. I have no desire to make any speech on the subject, but I have been greatly embarrassed in my relation with that people by the denial by Congress to the Post-Office Department of the appropriations asked for to carry on that service.

I think the principle embodied in that proviso is incorrect, and that we ought not to place ourselves upon record in its favor. I trust, on the contrary, the House will strike it out.

Why refuse to trust the amiable head of the Post-Office Department of the United States? It appears to me gentleman ought to be in a happy situation in that regard. Certainly he ought to be acceptable to the other side; he was not to me, personally, Mr. Chairman, but I now hope there will be no further attempt to limit the Department in this regard.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a single word in regard to this proviso. I hope it will remain in the bill, as I think there ought to be some restraint upon the Postmaster-General. He has already exceeded the appropriation by over $400,000 if he continues the expense for the postal-car service during the fiscal year at the same rate he has for the first two quarters. If we do not put this proviso on, of course there will be no restraint upon him. We do not know where he will end. We do not know how much he will require. Neither the Committee on Appropriations nor this House can tell what amount the Postmaster-General will expend upon this postal-car service if no restraint is put upon him. We made an appropriation for this fiscal year for the postal-car service, and he has taken that amount and spread it out for the first two quarters, necessitating retrenchment for the balance of the fiscal year or additional appropriation. It seems to me he should have made a judicious distribution of the sum and applied it to the whole fiscal year, and not put on an increase exhausting the entire amount for the first two quarters of the year, leaving the other two quarters to have diminished service. I trust, therefore, that the proviso will prevail.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Has the committee of which he is a member put in this deficiency bill an appropriation for the service which he forbids for the rest of the year?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. No, sir.

Mr. PHILLIPS. You bring it in on account of the increase.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to state, Mr. Chairman, that the only objection and the only comment I have to make in regard to this whole transaction is to the Postmaster-General saying he will not produce a deficiency by continning the same amount of postal-car service he now has. The comment I have to make is to know why he did not so feel at the beginning of the year. If the Postmaster-General had been as desirous and as anxious to keep himself within the bill, to keep himself within the law, to keep himself within the appropriation, he would not have been compelled to come forward now and say he will have to take off the postal-car service for the balance of the year unless you increase the appropriation $450,000. That is the comment I have to make, and it is a just one. The Postmaster-General ought to have been as careful at the beginning of the fiscal year as he now seems to be not to violate the intentions of Congress or to exceed the appropriation made by it.

Now, on this appropriation bill, I do not desire to enter into any discussion of the general expenditures of the Government, but I do want to make one or two remarks in reply to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER.] When he speaks about large deficiencies we have incurred I want to remind him that at the last session of Congress this House cleared the deck. We paid up old scores. We paid over $14,000,000 of deficiencies. Nearly six and a half millions of dollars of that $14,000,000 were justly attributable to the years the republican party ran this Government. They came down from years preceding and before the democratic party took possession of the House of Representatives—nearly one-half of the $14,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. PAGE. Is not another amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at the present time.

Mr. MITCHELL. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I renew it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, whenever the post-office bill is before this House the Committee on Appropriations have uniformly for years past made it less than the judgment of many if not a majority of the members thought it should be. It has been amended by being increased frequently. But whenever there is any attempt to amend it we hear the same tirade against the expenditure of the republican party, and we hear the same glorification from the gentleman from Tennessee and his colleagues about the retrenchment of the democratic party. And when the people of the United States demand mail service the gentleman from Tennessee says: "We are retrenching; we cannot give you your letters; we cannot give you your papers; we cannot send you your mails into the new frontier settlements; we cannot send your mails by the railroads as has hitherto been done." Now, the country has got tired of that. You cannot ride through a county of the northwestern part of the United States without somebody inquiring of you, "When will the gentleman from Tennessee give us mail service and stop going back four, six, eight, or ten years to tell how much the republicans expended by giving it to us?" The country is tired of all that talk. They want mail service. We protested against the small amount appropriated in the bill for this year. The gentleman from Georgia said it was enough.

Mr. BLOUNT. When did the gentleman protest, or any man on that side of the House?

Mr. CONGER. On this side of the House we protested continually.

Mr. BLOUNT. Not a syllable.

Mr. CONGER. We protested continually against his bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. Not a syllable; you voted for it.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman has forgotten the struggle we had here to get the appropriation for the star service.

Mr. BLOUNT. That was a different thing, and it was on a different occasion.

Mr. CONGER. And now the gentleman comes here, he is compelled to come here, and the Appropriations Committee, under the lead of the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Georgia, are compelled to come here and put in their bill that they have deceived the people of the United States in their pretended appropriations, and they acknowledge by law, in the bill, that a deficiency was necessary. How do they excuse themselves for that deficiency? By attacking the republican party. How do they excuse themselves for any of the delinquencies of the democracy? By attacking the republican party. How do they excuse themselves in reference to the cipher dispatches? By attacking the republican party and crying "fraud" on the republican candidate for the Presidency. I beg pardon; they do not defend themselves that way. They defend themselves against the attack based on the cipher dispatches by a silence that is profound as that of the grave. No living soul of the democracy is permitted—the distinguished gentleman from Gramercy Park, the head of the investigating committee, does not permit any honest democrat to allude to that, lest he should be called upon to investigate as the country does call upon him to investigate.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman from Michigan knows that the gentleman to whom he now alludes is not in his seat.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman was in his seat a minute ago.

Mr. SPARKS. He is not there now.

Mr. CONGER. He started out, then, when he saw me rise. [Laughter.]

Mr. TUCKER rose.

Mr. CONGER. I observe the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] is in his seat. Why in Heaven's name has he not called up the cipher dispatches? [Laughter.] Is nobody honest enough, nobody bold enough, even if the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] is not in his seat, to speak of these things when we are talking about the profligacy of parties? But, Mr. Chairman, I cannot blame any democrat for never alluding to the cipher dispatches for weeks in this House, for there is no man bold enough to defend them; there is no committee which will dare to examine them. Those dispatches stand there arrayed and backing up each other.

Several gentlemen have risen to attack the gentleman from Ohio. Even my long friend from Kentucky [laughter] rises here before he retires from the arena of his greatness to make an attack on the gentleman from Ohio, who accompanies him in his exit. Why could they not leave these questions for discussion among the scenes of domestic happiness to which they are about to return? [Laughter.]

Mr. DURHAM rose.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. RANDOLPH. If the Chair will recognize me, I will yield my time to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DURHAM. I understood I was recognized.

Mr. CONGER. I did not know that I had lost the floor; but if the gentleman from Kentucky or any other gentleman on that side of the House will speak on that subject, I will gladly yield to him.

Mr. DURHAM. I have ever since I became a member of this House directed my attention to the matter in hand. I have rarely gone beyond the subject under consideration for the purpose of making merriment on this floor, and consequently I disregard everything my friend from Michigan has said of a jovial character, and will discuss the bill under consideration. The cipher dispatches will take care of themselves; and so far as that matter is concerned, I suppose the whole country understands the present administration now in power was put there through fraudulent returns, and it makes no difference whether dispatches, cipher dispatches or other things, show or do not show that fact.

Mr. CONGER. Is that the explanation of the cipher dispatches?

Mr. DURHAM. No, sir; I leave the matter of the cipher dispatches to work itself out. The proper committee will attend to all that.

I wish to say to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] that it is not the object of this proviso to restrict the postal service in this country. That is not the case by any means. Its object is to restrict the postal-car service. That has been distinctly and explicitly explained by my colleague on the committee and it has been shown that the increase in the last year has been over 40 per cent. Now, I will not say as has been said by some of these gentlemen that we can leave this whole matter to the Postmaster-General. I am willing to trust him upon all proper occasions; but, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say to you that if the Postmaster-General will violate the law at one time he may violate it in a dozen instances. Do you ask me if he has violated the law? I say that the Postmaster-General has violated the spirit of the law. Congress at its last session limited him to a certain amount for the postal-car service, and what has he done. Do you ask me if he has done it intentionally? I must say, sir, that he ought to have known his duty and to have observed the law. He has expended an undue proportion of the amount this House and the Senate put at his disposal for the purpose of maintaining the postal service of the country for this fiscal year, knowing very well that he had Congress by the throat, because he knew that this is a tender subject upon which Congress in all probability would vote almost any amount for the deficiency that he might create; but having expended this undue proportion appropriated by the last House, he comes and brings in this deficiency.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr DURHAM. Well.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Is this appropriation made to meet a just expenditure?

Mr. DURHAM. It is proposed to appropriate $450,000 to meet a deficiency which the Postmaster-General brings about by violating the spirit of the law.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Is it a just expenditure of public money?

Mr. DURHAM. It is the expenditure of more money than was appropriated; he had no right to exceed the appropriations of Congress.

Mr. PHILLIPS. That is not my question; my question is, is this a judicious and just expenditure of public money?

Mr. DURHAM. That does not excuse him at all. I say the Constitution and the laws invest Congress with the sole power to appropriate money, and the Postmaster-General, or the Executive, or any other Department has no right to exceed the appropriations made and thus create deficiencies. In so doing they violate the spirit of the law.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will you answer another question?

Mr. DURHAM. It was the duty of this officer to cut his garment according to the cloth that Congress gave him. Now, I will say this much: that I am for ample post-office communication everywhere.

I was amazed to hear the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] who has scarcely a town of respectable size in his district, talking of postal cars. I wonder if any one ever heard of a postal car out there. Talk about postal cars! Why, sir, it would scare his country for one of them to run into his district. [Laughter.] If he wants to do something; if he really means to be candid, let him join me and be honest about it, and ask for star service. I want star service in my country, and I am very glad if we can get it twice a week in some portions of the country. Why does he talk of postal cars? It is just for the purpose of making fun upon the floor.

Confine yourself to the wants of your own section of country and do not be putting on your airs here. [Great laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw the amendment and renew it. I have been told by the gentleman himself and partly by his neighbors that in his whole district there is not one manufacturing establishment of any kind whatever, not even a shoe-peg manufactory, except it be, either in public places or private places, the manufactory of alcoholic liquors. [Laughter.] I have been told that there is one newspaper published in the gentleman's district, and that there are three public school-houses in that district remote, very remote in that long district, from the residence of the gentleman who represents it here. [Laughter.] I have been told that the gentleman, traveling in Michigan, as he passed over our railroads, seeing these splendid edifices of which every village in Michigan can boast, and which we call our Union school-houses, turned to one of his southern colleagues, as they came by that roundabout way, and said, "We cannot wonder that the Treasury of the United States is depleted when every village which we go through has a grand Government building in it." [Great laughter.] He traveled on our railroads through Michigan and saw in every village, to say nothing of our cities, these splendid buildings for the education of all the children, and you could not convince him that the republican party had not stolen from the Treasury of the United States the money with which to build these "grand Government buildings." And he came here very angry about it. I talked with him every alternate day as I had opportunity, pausing in the labor of our committee of which he and I were members, and tried to convince him that our own people built the school-houses. [Laughter.] But I had to send to our State capital and get a statement from there of the cost of these buildings and of the appropriations made for them, showing that the intelligent, educated people of Michigan constructed their own school-houses. [Renewed laughter.]

The gentleman has referred to the "little unheard-of village" where I reside. To be sure it is a village of only twelve thousand inhabitants; to be sure it has only five great railways centering there. To be sure the Saint Clair River, connecting that great chain of lakes, those immense arteries of commerce, runs past my door. The gentleman himself has been upon that river where forty thousand passages of vessels in each year make the river and the foot of Lake Huron alive with their beautiful sails and the emblems of their commerce. But what does the gentleman care for that?

From my door he can start on one of these vessels and go to the extreme northern portion of our lakes. He can take the Grand Trunk Railroad and go to Montreal, Quebec, Portland, and Boston. He can go from there by railroad to Detroit and Lansing and Chicago and to the Falls of Niagara. He can go from there on any one of the five or six great railroads that center there.

Oh, that the gentleman had had a school-house [laughter] where he could have studied geography; where he could have devoted an hour or two from the excessive labors which have borne upon him in his efforts to attack the republican party and to make wicked and unnecessary retrenchments; where he should have learned something about his own native beloved country! What a wise man he might have become, and how happy he might be in the knowledge he could thus acquire.

Mr. DURHAM. May I ask the gentleman——

Mr. CONGER. As to his district, I do not wonder that the star service is all the service he has there.

Mr. DURHAM. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CONGER. I do not know whether the Mammoth Cave is in his district. [Laughter.] But if it is not, then I should say that the gentleman's district above ground was the dark Mammoth Cave of the United States.

Mr. DURHAM. May I ask you a question?

Mr. CONGER. Certainly.

Mr. DURHAM. Now, honor bright, did your people ever see a postal car? [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. Why, sir, they have them on every one of the five railroads. I myself have the appointment of seven or eight route-agents upon those postal cars. [Great laughter.] The gentleman does not know what a route-agent means. He knows that on the cars that run along the border of his district—not through it—there is a little cubby-house that the drovers of cattle occupy as they go with their droves to the East, and he thinks those are postal cars. [Great laughter.]

Mr. DURHAM. How does the gentleman get authority to appoint so many route-agents on postal cars?

Mr. CONGER. By the laws of the United States of America.

Mr. DURHAM. I did not know how the gentleman came by so much power.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman will go up into the enlightened land of Michigan, if he will sojourn in that State that sleeps among the lakes and is threaded by railroads in every direction, and see our postal cars——

Mr. DURHAM. And listen to the music of the bull-frogs. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the committee now rise for the purpose of closing debate on this bill.

Mr. CONGER. I hope not, until we can hear about the cipher dispatches.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. BLOUNT; and it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that, in pursuance of the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 5682) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for transportation of mails by railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that when the House again resolves itself into Committee of the Whole on the postal deficiency appropriation bill all debate on the bill and amendments be limited to one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the pending bill.

Mr. HANNA. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The motion of Mr. BLOUNT, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. CARLISLE in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the postal deficiency appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] to strike out the proviso.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 99, noes 93.

Mr. PHILLIPS called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PHILLIPS and Mr. BLOUNT were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 76, noes 92.

So the amendment of Mr. PHILLIPS was not agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER. I move to amend the proviso by striking out the words "in the postal-car service" and inserting "of additional pay for postal cars;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That no increase of additional pay for postal cars beyond what existed on the 1st day of December, 1878, shall be made during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879.

Mr. ATKINS. I suggest that the gentleman should insert the word "service" after the word "postal cars."

Mr. OLIVER. I believe I have one minute for debate.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate has been exhausted by order of the House; but the gentleman will proceed for one minute if there be no objection.

Mr. OLIVER. I find that the pay for postal cars is separate from the pay for railway mail service. Now in my district two railroads have been constructed, one of which is over one hundred miles in length——

Mr. BLOUNT. Is debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, debate is not in order.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. OLIVER. I understood that I was to be allowed to proceed by consent. At any rate there is one minute allowed for debate under the order of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will remember that this amendment was not pending when the House made the order limiting debate.

Mr. OLIVER. But debate was limited to one minute on the bill and amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate of one minute allowed under the order of the House applied to the bill and the amendment then pending, and by the universal construction of such orders it precludes debate upon all subsequent amendments, though it does not prevent the offering of amendments.

Mr. WAIT. I trust the amendment will prevail——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

The question being taken upon agreeing to the amendment of Mr. OLIVER, it was not agreed to, there being ayes 19, noes not counted.

Mr. PAGE. I move to amend by striking out all after the word "provided" and inserting "that no increase in the postal-car service in excess of this appropriation shall be allowed."

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope this amendment will not be adopted.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move to amend by adding "$50,000 for clerical allowances in offices when the increase of business requires it."

I wish the gentleman from Georgia would allow me to state my reasons for offering this amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I cannot consent to further debate, but will simply say to the gentleman that at the proper time we shall have a bill with reference to this subject.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT moved that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 5682) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for the transportation of mails by railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and had directed him to report the same with the recommendation that it pass.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read a third time, and passed.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I desired to move an amendment to the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. It is too late.

Mr. FOSTER. I shouted pretty loudly in trying to get the attention of the Chair. I wished to amend the title so as to read "A bill to correct an error of the democratic House at the last session."

DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. SINGLETON, by unanimous consent, the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5312) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, were taken from the Speaker's table, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

IMPROVEMENT OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4318) to provide for the organization of the "Mississippi River Improvement Commission" and for the correction, permanent location, and deepening of the channel and the improvement of the navigation of said Mississippi River, and the protection of its alluvial lands, and that the same be made a special order for the 14th of January next and from time to time until disposed of.

Mr. ATKINS. Not to interfere with appropriation bills.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object to discharging the Committee of the Whole. I want the bill where we can debate it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana does not ask to cut off debate.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. If it be brought up in the House I shall not be heard. I want to be heard in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I will modify my motion so as to make the bill a special order in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill will be made a special order in Committee of the Whole for the 14th of January next, to the exclusion of all prior orders.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the order was made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. WILLIAMS, of New York, until the 20th instant, on account of important business;

To Mr. WILLIAMS, of Alabama, for two days, from Thursday morning next;

To Mr. OVERTON, for three days, on account of important business; and

To Mr. WARNER, for three days, on account of important business.

DISTRIBUTION OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. As it is a matter that concerns the convenience of the Post-Office Department, I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It directs the Secretary of State to furnish to the Post-Office Department, not exceeding two hundred and fifty copies out of the fifteen thousand copies of the new edition of the first volume of the Revised Statutes of the United States, for the use of the officers and special agents of the Department and of postmasters at offices of free delivery; no provision having been made for the Post-Office Department in the joint resolution providing for the distribution and sale of the new edition of the Revised Statutes of the United States, approved May 22, 1878.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1534) to provide for the appointment of official stenographers for the courts of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the bill is referred I beg to say that here is a petition on which the bill is founded, which I should like to have go with it, and also a letter addressed to me and which I should like to go with the bill to the committee.

Mr. TELLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 763) to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts in the district of Colorado; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

JURORS' OATH.

Mr. BECK. I desire now to call up the bill (S. No. 1505) to repeal sections 820 and 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, of which I gave notice yesterday and which is now on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McMILLAN. I object to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. BECK. Then I move to take up the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the pending and all prior orders be laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill he has named.

Mr. BECK. May I be allowed to say a word? If it leads to any debate I will not press it now.

Mr. MORRILL. Has the bill been acted upon by any committee?

Mr. BECK. Allow me to make a statement. All the provisions of section 820 of the Revised Statutes were repealed by the fifth section of the act passed April 20, 1871, known as the enforcement act, which repealed section 1 of the act of June 17, 1862, and they were inadvertently restored in the Revised Statutes. If I am not able to show that by simply reading the statute I will not ask for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the Senator from Kentucky whether he does not think it is a bill of sufficient importance to have received the attention of some committee?

Mr. BECK. It was referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws in a House bill, so far as that section is concerned, the 8th day of December last, and no action has yet been taken upon the bill of the House and the necessity for immediate action is urgent. It is apparent upon the face of the statutes that section 820 is wrongfully inserted in the Revised Statutes. I have all the statutes before me. They show conclusively the repeal of the first section of the act of 1862, and show that it was wrongfully inserted in the Revised Statutes; of course, I assume, by mistake. I have also before me the decision of Judge Wood, of the circuit court of Louisiana, setting forth the facts and the effect of them, and the importance of having the obvious mistake corrected. Surely that ought to be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. In the absence of my colleague, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and in the absence of most other members of the Judiciary Committee, I shall object to its consideration until at least the chairman returns. I expect him here now within an hour or two.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be reported in order that the Senate may understand it.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 820 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, prescribing additional causes of disqualification and challenge of grand and petit jurors in the courts of the United States, and section 821 of said Revised Statutes, which prescribes an additional oath for grand and petit jurors in said courts, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the present state of that bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on the motion that the pending and all prior orders be laid aside in order that this bill may now be considered.

Mr. CONKLING. But I inquire what is the state of the bill? Is it before a committee or before the Senate?

Mr. BECK. I can answer the Senator from New York.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is on the Calendar, the Chair understands from the Secretary, having been read the first and second time.

Mr. BECK. I introduced the bill the other day and asked that it should lie on the table subject to be called up. I have now called it up because there are cases now pending in Louisiana and elsewhere in which there are serious troubles growing out of the existence of this section 820, which section 820 was, as I said before, in fact repealed in 1871, and was inserted wrongfully, by accident or otherwise, in the Revised Statutes. It is not a part of the law in truth and in fact, and is only operative so far as the Revised Statutes make it so, as it stands positively repealed on the statutes-book prior to the revision which declared that the existing laws were not interfered with. The importance of early action is my reason for calling it up.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to inquire, is there not the same bill or an equivalent bill before the Judiciary Committee, referred to it at the last session?

Mr. BECK. I had the honor to introduce a bill and have it referred to the Judiciary Committee which embraced that and a great many other things than that; but believing that this single section and section 821 ought to be repealed and that there would be no objection to it, and on account of the pressing necessity for its passage, I introduced this bill with these provisions alone in it, leaving out a good many other provisions that were in the bill which I introduced last session and which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will hear me, I think I shall be right in fact in informing him—I observe two of my colleagues on the committee present who will correct my recollection if it is erroneous—that the very point he now presents to the Senate has been and is before the Judiciary Committee, has been a topic of consideration not only but of discussion, upon which opinions in the committee differ; so that it is a matter, perhaps I ought not to say of controversy but of divided judgment as to the proposed legislative action. If I am right—and a moment's reflection in stating it confirms me in my recollection—I submit to the Senator and to the Senate that upon a matter so important as this—because it is a very grave matter—the Senate in the first place ought not to proceed without an examination by the appropriate committee.

But again, and more urgently, I venture to say that a committee having been charged with the examination of this very question, and not having been derelict, I think I may say, or guilty of neglect in regard to it, it would be unusual practice for the Senate, and in the absence too of the chairman of the committee, to take up in a mode so summary a question so important, once and now committed to a committee and awaiting its action, and proceed to make final disposition of that question in the morning hour upon such a statement, an intelligent one of course and a conscientious one of course, as may come from the Senator moving the bill. I think, with respect to that Senator, he will agree with me that as a rule it would be dangerous practice, and I think a practice not customary in this body, if indeed in any legislative body. I heard the Senator from Vermont say that his colleague, the chairman of the committee, was expected here to-day. Am I right?

Mr. MORRILL. I understand so.

Mr. CONKLING. So the Senator says he understands; and therefore I hope the Senator from Kentucky, unless his personal convenience will be in some way incommoded, will allow this at least to lie until the chairman of the committee, who is bound more than I am to know the condition of affairs before the committee, is in his seat and able to give the Senator and the Senate such information as there may be.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, only one word. The Senator from New York is right in saying that a bill containing this provision is before the Committee on the Judiciary, but the bill before that committee embraces a great many other things about which that committee, it seems, has differed. For example, it embraces all the matters connected with the oath for young men who may have served in the confederate service and desire to go into the Federal Army.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me a moment there? I did not mean to challenge the statement of the Senator in that regard; he may be right; but I am right also in the statement I now make to him, namely, that this very point, separated from others, standing by itself, has been a topic of discussion in the committee and a subject on which the committee thus far has not come to a conclusion.

Mr. BECK. I desire only to add this: the bill containing this special provision relating to section 820 was referred not to the Committee on the Judiciary but to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, of which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] is chairman. Last evening when the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] called attention to the bill, in the presence of the Senator from Michigan, I gave notice that the bill I had offered which was on the table would be called up by me this morning, believing that either this bill or the House bill which has been passed there nearly a year or perhaps over a year might be substituted for mine, though mine perfects what the House bill intended, and the statutes of the United States be corrected in that regard, because the statutes show that as to the particular section 820, it was repealed in 1871, and by intendment section 821 also and was put into the Revised Statutes when it ought not to be there. Section 820 was repealed in express terms, as the law shows, and Judge Wood of the circuit court of Louisiana who had the question before him, carefully sets forth all the facts in a very elaborate opinion, which I have not time to read. We only desire now that that section of the Revised Statutes be repealed, because it never ought to have been there, and is in truth and in fact no part of the law of the land. The revisers having no power and disavowing any intention to change existing law have re-enacted by their revision a statute of the United States which was positively repealed, and have done it in such a way that it is difficult to see how it could escape their attention. That is all I desire or have time to say, as the Senator from Arkansas asks to be heard.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, this matter, in my judgment, ought to arrest the immediate attention of every Senator in this body. The facts, as admitted on all hands, are as follows: that seven years ago a law prescribing severe test oaths for the qualifications of jurors was repealed by the Congress of the United States. Since that time, a revision of our statutes, authorized by law, has taken place, and into that revision has crept this repealed and proscriptive law, and it is standing there now unjustly, improperly, and unlawfully; and it ought to be stricken out the very first moment attention is called to it. I do not seek to reflect upon the revisers of our statutes, but this is not the first time accidents of this kind have happened. I will content myself, however, on this occasion with saying that accidents of this kind render the labors of such revisers valueless. Who can rely with any confidence upon the statutes as revised when we employ men who do not know what to put in that revision as law or what to keep out of it as having been repealed?

I repeat, Mr. President, this question ought to arrest the immediate attention of the Senate. There stands now upon your statute books a law prescribing test oaths for the service of jurors, that which is not law, which has been stricken down and repealed as a relic of the passions, if not the barbarisms, that immediately succeeded the war, in the legislation of this country.

Sir, a word in regard to the statement made by the Senator from New York. It is true that this question has been before a committee. It is true, according to the statement made by the Senator from Louisiana in his place here yesterday evening, that more than a year ago the House of Representatives sent a bill here correcting the error in the revision of the statutes, and again repealing this odious provision. It was referred to the proper committee, the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, the committee that is charged with that subject. This House bill has slept in that committee for more than one year. I did not know until the Senator from New York so stated, that it had been before the Judiciary Committee likewise. If it has, I can only express my profound amazement that any committee, whether the Committee on the Revision of the Laws or the Judiciary Committee, would allow a bill like this to slumber more than a year on its files, thus allowing the laws of the country to be defaced and to appear a deception and a snare, and especially upon a subject of this kind.

I understood the Senator from Michigan, and as a matter of course I accept his statement entirely, to state that he was not aware that this bill had been before the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. All I know is what the record shows. The record shows that in the Senate of the United States, on the 6th day of December, 1877, an act to repeal section 820 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was read twice and referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and that is the last that we have heard of it. I am not particular as to the mode in which this wrong and outrage shall be remedied. If it is best to do it by the bill offered by the Senator from Kentucky, I am ready for that; but I do think that it is incumbent upon the Committee on the Revision of the Laws or upon the Judiciary Committee, or upon both, to act, and to act promptly.

Mr. BECK. Before the Senator from Indiana sits down I wish to say to him that the bill I present also seeks the repeal of section 821 as well as section 820.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Indiana, following a fashion which to be sure he has not set because there are precedents for it in the Senate, with somewhat of severity of stricture, has seen fit to comment upon the work of those who revised the statutes. He employs the word "outrage," and he does not forget to use the word "ignorance" in respect to this matter. It is not for me to challenge the propriety of such observations. It is, I think, however, something approaching a duty to remind the Senate of who it is on whom the Senator from Indiana thus passes such summary and sweeping judgment.

These statutes were revised by some six or seven or eight commissioners succeeding each other. Several of them came from the State of Ohio, supposed by one Senator, not now in his seat, to be especially the land of the law and of erudition. Among these commissioners were men conspicuous in the profession to which they belong. They were selected, some of them, by Mr. Lincoln, and some of them were selected by his successors in office. They were confirmed by the Senate. They proceeded with their duties; they made report of their work; and their report was examined,—examined by the appropriate committees of both Houses. I remember that when this work underwent examination in the House of Representatives a conspicuous member of the committee having it in charge had recently been Attorney-General of the United States. In this body it was examined by a committee composed of those, some of whom are not here; I remember one who formerly sat behind me a Senator from Wisconsin, gifted as I may say unusually in the respects needed for this work.

On the report of these committees the work of the commissioners, with such trifling emendations as were proposed, received the sanction, first of one House, then of the other House, and thus of both Houses of Congress, and the signature of the Executive, with whom under the Constitution is deposited one-sixth of the law-making power.

Now the Senator from Indiana speaking of all these authorities in the aggregate denounces as an outrage and criticises as an ignorance, not merely the particular instance which he thinks he has found, but other instances which he generalizes or bunches with this as the appropriate occasion for such observation.

Mr. VOORHEES. May I ask the Senator from New York a question?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask him whether he does or does not regard it an outrage to embrace in the laws of this country that which is not law on a subject so vital to the cause of liberty and justice as the qualifications of jurors and send it forth to the country as law? Is that an outrage, or is it not?

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President——

Mr. VOORHEES. And further, so as not to interrupt the Senator again, I ask if the revisers, whether they lived in Ohio or any place else—and I am not seeking to make any personal issue or personal assault—are not guilty of ignorance in doing that thing?

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, as to Ohio, I mentioned that State, I thought not inappropriately, merely to pay tribute to the sufficiency of that State, as we all know, in furnishing public agents consummately adapted to every public function, whether for the revision of statutes or the higher ministrations of public office. I hope the Senator from Indiana, being the immediate neighbor of the great Commonwealth of Ohio, will not resent a passing and innocent compliment paid to that State.

Mr. President, it requires not one-half the ingenuity of the honorable Senator from Indiana to propose a question or a conundrum which must be answered in only one way. So he says suppose a case of an interpolation into the statutes professing to revive as law what is not law, is not that a wrong, or is not that an outrage? Very likely; but as in most cases of controversy and casuistry the difficulty is not with the principle, it is with the application of it; the difficulty is not with the conclusion but it is with the premise: in a given case such as the Senator states, everybody would answer one way. But I submit to the honorable Senator from Indiana, when it turns out that lawyers, a large number of lawyers seriatim having addressed their attention to a particular point have upon that point come to a conclusion exactly opposite to that which the Senator has reached, if it does not afford a presumption which at least makes some headway in rebutting a presumption that an outrage, a case of craft, ignorance, and neglect, has been found.

Now, if it be true that all these revisers and examiners and reviewers and legislators have fallen into a blunder, certainly it should be corrected notwithstanding the fact that so many have fallen into it; but on the threshold, at the point at which we now stand, namely the point of inquiring whether such be the fact or not, and if it be to what extent it is a fact, whether to the whole extent or only in part, I respectfully submit to the honorable Senator that it is not only decorous but convenient, orderly, economical of consequences, to have a committee sit down and look and look before we are asked to leap comparatively in the dark. And as I see the Senator rising I venture to re-enforce my suggestion by reminding him that it has already been stated that on this very point, after looking at it the Law Committee of this body has not been able up to this time to report, as the Senator affirms, but on the contrary divided opinions, conclusions not concurring have been reached. So I think the Senator will see that instead of this being an unreasonable opposition it is a very provident and suitable opposition.

And now I beg to ask the Chair whether the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] interposed an objection to the consideration of this bill in the morning hour?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He did; but the business of the morning hour having been declared closed, the Senator from Kentucky submitted a motion that the pending and all prior orders be laid aside.

Mr. CONKLING. And was that motion, despite an objection, in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The objection made by the Senator from Vermont was to the request for unanimous consent to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. CONKLING. By the Senator from Kentucky?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky first asked unanimous consent that this bill might now be considered to which the Senator from Vermont objected. He then made a motion that the pending and all prior orders be laid aside.

Mr. CONKLING. And will the Chair be kind enough to inform me—I did not follow the run of the business—whether that motion was in order at that moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thought it was, as he had called for further business of the morning hour and there was none.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon; I did not observe that there was no further morning business.

Mr. VOORHEES. I think the Senator from New York is laboring under an error, and I only desire to get at exact statements of fact in this matter. I understand this question has been before the Judiciary Committee in the shape of a bill to repeal the test-oath act, not in the shape of an inquiry as to whether it has been repealed.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, if the honorable Senator will pardon me there,—I judge he will, for probably he wants my understanding on that point——

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not so understand. On the contrary, this question has been before the committee not only, as the Senator from Kentucky doubtless correctly says, in a bill containing also other provisions, but this particular topic in its length and breadth, in all its aspects comprehended by the Judiciary Committee has been before that committee and has been considered, and, speaking theoretically, I may say is being now considered, although the committee at this moment is not in session, and perhaps if it was this subject would not be before it; but it is a matter pending in the committee and pending in all the respects pertinent to it.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me one moment?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. As I understand it, during the last session of Congress one bill, and perhaps more than one bill, came from the House of Representatives and was before the Judiciary Committee to repeal both these sections, 820 and 821, and a subcommittee was appointed, if I may be allowed to speak of what was done by the Judiciary Committee, upon that subject, and no conclusion has been reached upon it. Whether the eight hundred and twentieth section had really been repealed or not was an inquiry to be made by the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. I was a member of that committee, but I really never heard until yesterday that such a bill was referred to it. The Judiciary Committee simply have had before them the inquiry whether it was proper and right that those two sections should be repealed. That was the inquiry they had before them, and upon that inquiry final action has not been taken. That is the status of it, as I understand.

The chairman of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY,] asked me yesterday if I had ever heard of any bill or any inquiry being addressed to that committee on this subject, and I replied to him yesterday that I had not. I was not aware until the Senator from Indiana this morning read the records of the Senate that any such bill had been referred there.

Mr. BECK. Now, Mr. President, I desire to say an additional word to make my position plain, and I shall occupy only a moment to repeat that. The history of this matter is this: A bill passed the House a year ago and was referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, the chairman of which yesterday afternoon said they had not looked at it. I had introduced a bill a long time ago for the repeal of the test oath as to everybody and everything, and had argued it as well as I could in a brief, and, I thought, argued it pretty well, before the Committee on the Judiciary. That bill has not been considered so far as I am advised.

Knowing the trouble as to the provisions about jurors I introduced a bill the other day to repeal these two sections, and knowing that one section belonged to the Revision of the Laws Committee and the other to the Judiciary Committee, I had not determined where it was proper to go, when the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] yesterday afternoon made the case so apparent on account of the great trouble occurring there, and as I am advised by many lawyers from my section of similar troubles elsewhere, I gave notice that I would call up this bill lying on the table to-day and then the House bill could, if mine was objected to seriously, be substituted for it. The House bill repeals only section 820 in terms. I desired, if nothing more could be done, to get action on that about which I supposed there would be no dispute because the facts show there can be no dispute about it. The fifth section of the act of April 20, 1871, provides:

And the first section of the act entitled "An act defining additional causes of challenge and prescribing an additional oath for grand and petit jurors in the United States courts," approved June 17, 1862, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The first section of that act of June 17, 1862, is almost word for word embodied in section 820 of the Revised Statutes, and as the revisers were not seeking to change in law the re-enactment of the act of 1862, restored, according to the decision of the courts in Louisiana and elsewhere, that provision which had been repealed. Believing that it was only necessary to call attention to the fact, as was done in the House, that they had restored the law which had been repealed and that it was working great inconvenience and injustice now, and was not the law of the land in any proper sense, I supposed there would be no difficulty in the Senate in correcting the record so as to make the laws show the truth.

I will now yield to the Senator from Arkansas, and ask pardon for not doing it sooner.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to cast reflection on either of the committees that have had this matter in hand, or upon the revisers of the statutes; but we are confronted at this time, on the statement made by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] yesterday, with the necessity of immediate action upon this subject, or have the United States court in Louisiana, soon to sit, to flounder again as it has heretofore on this very subject.

Now I think the way out of this difficulty is perfectly clear and perfectly easy. This section 820, as a matter of fact before us as plainly and as positively as any fact can be shown, was repealed by the act of 20th April, 1871. Outside of that fact, which we know by the records of Congress, it has been judicially ascertained that the statute was repealed, but afterward by mistake found its way again into the Revised Statutes. The United States court that sits in the State of Arkansas after the repealing statute of April 20, 1871, ignored the test oath, and ceased to give it in charge any more or to recognize it at all. I believe I state a fact which every gentleman of the profession will recognize at once when I say that the profession believed that the statute of 1862 was at an end, had ceased to exist, and was gone forever. But in the case of The United States vs. Hammond, before Judge Woods, in the second of Woods's Reports, the question was fairly and squarely presented upon a plea in abatement and a demurrer to the plea. The judge finds as follows upon that:

Since the argument of the demurrer it has been suggested that section 820 of the Revised Statutes was improperly included by the compilers in their revision of the statutes, that section not having been in force on the 1st day of December, 1873. This appears to be true.

The court must have been satisfied by competent testimony that that was true, or it would never have uttered that expression.

The section referred to was section 1 of the act approved June 17, 1862, entitled "An act defining additional causes of challenge, and prescribing an additional oath for grand and petit jurors in the United States courts." (12 Statutes, 430.) This section was repealed by the fifth section of the act approved April 20, 1871, "to enforce the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and for other purposes." (17 Statutes, 15.)

But the conclusion which the prosecutor seeks to draw from these facts, namely, that section 820 of the Revised Statutes is not now a part of the statute law, does not, in my opinion, follow. The work of the compilers, including section 820, was submitted to Congress and the whole re-enacted by the adoption of the Revised Statutes. The compilers may have exceeded their authority, Congress may not have designed to re-enact section 820, but it has done so, and we cannot go behind the law and cure the mistakes and inaccuracies of Congress.

There is the fact ascertained that the statute of 1862 was repealed, but by mistake it found its way into the compilation of the Revised Statutes. Judge Woods holds that this law being in existence was not a matter to be enforced or not as the court in its discretion saw proper, although my own impression, as I believe that of the legal profession generally, was contrary to this view. And this makes it important for Congress to act upon the matter without delay.

The revisers had no legislative power, as a matter of course, and under the Constitution legislative power could not be delegated to them by the Congress of the United States; but by a general act adopting their compilation mistakes and errors in their work went to the country as genuine. Now shall Congress adhere to the repeal under the act of 20th April, 1871, or shall it adhere to the compilation? That is the plain and practical question presented to Congress, and its settlement does not involve necessarily any reflection upon the compilers or any reflection upon either of the committees that had some charge of their work.

Mr. President, as a matter of fact it seems to me the question is a very plain one as to what the duty of Congress is. The necessity for immediate action was shown by the statement made by the Senator from Louisiana yesterday at the close of our session. The test-oath law as to jurors being by the adoption of the revision by Congress now in force, it can be got rid of only by repeal, as the adoption of the revision was, as Judge Woods holds, an enactment of the law prescribing the oath.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, the only question to be decided now is, I think, whether or not this particular bill shall be acted upon by the Senate without being referred to a committee. Now, the fact is that this question has not only already been referred to a committee but it has been referred to two committees, to one of them as long ago as December 6, 1877. The Senator from New York says that this has been in question, under consideration, on repeated occasions by the Judiciary Committee. If that be so, considering the very peculiar condition of this question and its very great importance and the necessity for immediate action, it occurs to me as very singular that that committee has not made a report upon the subject.

I stated yesterday that it was possible that jurors might be impaneled in the State of Louisiana under a law which has been repealed, and I wish now to state to the Senate that this question can have no political significance whatever. I have seen in the city of New Orleans going into the United States court-room hundreds of the best citizens of that city summoned to serve as jurors in the United States court, merchants, mechanics, and the very best portion of that population as regards intelligence, responsibility, fitness, and qualification to act as jurors, not only with reference to criminal but with reference to civil cases; and yet I have seen every one of those persons leave that court-room upon a motion made by the district-attorney declaring them to be unfit associates to serve on juries with ignorant and incompetent colored men. It is a question——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has now expired. The Chair must recognize the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] on the special order.

Mr. WADLEIGH rose.

CANNON FOR CUSTER MONUMENT.

Mr. SPENCER. Before the Senator from New Hampshire proceeds I ask consent to make a report. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5532) authorizing the donation of twenty condemned bronze cannon to aid in the erection of a monument to the memory of General George A. Custer at the Military Academy at West Point, to report the same back favorably and recommend its passage. As it cannot occupy a moment's time, I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill just reported by the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. WADLEIGH. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes to the Calendar.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator withdraws his objection. This will not take a second. It is a very short bill.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I will not object if it can be disposed of at once.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 5682) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for transportation of mails by railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 210) making an appropriation for the purpose of paying the necessary expenses incurred in investigating the origin and causes of epidemic diseases in the United States.

The message further announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5312) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5231) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the resolution of the House providing for the adjournment of the two Houses on the 20th instant.

REVISION OF THE PATENT LAWS.

Mr. BECK. Is it in order now to make the motion I made before to postpone the present and all prior orders?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is if the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] yields the floor for that purpose. The Senator from New Hampshire has been recognized on the special order, which is the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This bill is still in Committee of the Whole and amendable.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I have some amendments to offer after the Senator from New Hampshire is through with his opening speech.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I will make this motion, Mr. President: the bill as amended in Committee of the Whole has been printed, and I move that the bill as thus amended be reported to the Senate and considered as an original bill open to all amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the suggestion?

Mr. WINDOM. This is a very important bill, and I think it ought to be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from New Hampshire to proffer the widest liberty of amending.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Certainly; any amendment may be offered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That would be so independently of the offer.

Mr. WINDOM. Then I have no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill, then, is reported to the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Will it be in order, then, to strike out anything that has been inserted?

Mr. WINDOM. I understand any amendment is in order in the Senate as it would be in committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is. The bill having been reported to the Senate, the first question is, Will the Senate agree to the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, having been compelled to be absent at the moment when I might have learned by an answer to the question I put that which I seek to know, I ask now the attention of the chairman of the committee to section 7 of the bill, and I inquire of him whether it still stands as printed on page 7?

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] is kind enough to tell me that I have another print from that on which the Senate is acting and that the section that I referred to is on page 10 of the present print.

Mr. WADLEIGH. That is so, and I propose to offer to that section an amendment which I am satisfied will meet the objection of my friend the Senator from New York. I will show it to him.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from New Hampshire shows me an amendment which I think meets the point that I had in mind, and therefore I make no objection.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I move, Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the better way would be to proceed under the rule; it is the more correct and the safer mode; and the question now is upon the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. Is a separate vote demanded upon any one of the several amendments made as in Committee of the Whole to this bill? [A pause.] If not, will the Senate agree to the amendments in gross?

Mr. WINDOM. There are one or two that I desire to have a separate vote on.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires that the Senate shall understand the question. Is a separate vote demanded on any one of the several amendments made to this bill as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. WINDOM. I do demand a separate vote on some of them, and I am waiting to point them out.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. After we hear from the Senator from New Hampshire, in his opening speech, I shall have some amendments which I wish to propose. Will it be in order to propose them then, or should they be presented now?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first question, of course, is on the amendments already made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Then the other amendments afterward. The Senator from New Hampshire wishes to address the Senate on the subject, I believe, and can I move amendments after he has spoken, or must I do it now?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator can move amendments at any moment up to the time the bill is ordered to a third reading.

Mr. MITCHELL. I submit that if the Senator from Illinois has an amendment he desires to make to any amendment made as in Committee of the Whole he will be barred after those amendments shall have been acted on.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. My amendments reach the second section and all the sections that have been adopted.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then the Senator's amendments relate to amendments made in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WINDOM. I have amendments to offer to several of the amendments made in committee, and I therefore ask for a separate vote on each of the amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments will then be reported seriatim. The amendments will be reported in the order in which they were made in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I did not intend to say anything upon this bill until the Senator from New Hampshire had presented his views of it; but as I am opposed to some of the amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole, and really wish to amend them as they have been adopted, I shall be glad to say what I have to say upon them before he speaks, if he has no objection.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Certainly I have no objection.

Mr. BOOTH. One moment. Do I understand the Chair to rule that this bill as amended cannot be considered under any parliamentary law as a substitute for the original bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled nothing of the kind.

Mr. BOOTH. Then I make the motion that the bill as amended in the Committee of the Whole be considered as a substitute for the original bill. That, I understand, will leave the amended bill open to any amendment, whether it be by the restoration of matter formerly stricken out, or the restoration of the committee's amendment that has been amended by the amendments which I had the honor to offer, or by any new suggestion. It gives us this simple text. I think it will be very much better to follow that course.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to suggest in that connection that it facilitates amendments, because it admits amendments in one further degree.

Mr. BOOTH. It admits every amendment; it throws the whole field open.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As the whole field is now open.

Mr. BOOTH. But it is said we have to consider every amendment separately.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I would say to the Senator from California that I prepared my amendment with a view to the second section as adopted.

Mr. BOOTH. It is understood that this bill as amended in Committee of the Whole represents the views of its friends. I should be very glad if this amended bill could be considered as a substitute for the original bill and considered in Committee of the Whole, so that its text can be perfected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands there are two prints of this bill. The one before him and before the Secretary is the print ordered by the Senate——

Mr. MITCHELL. December 11.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. December 11. The Chair thinks the regular order is that the amendments made in Committee of the Whole should be reported. Any Senator has the right to demand a separate vote upon any one of these amendments. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] has demanded a separate vote upon each and every amendment.

Mr. BOOTH. Does the Chair rule my motion out of order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Not at all.

Mr. BOOTH. Then I make the motion.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Chair allow me one moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I submit to the Chair and to the Senator from California, although I know it is his view that if his motion prevails we shall have as an original bill before us the product of the Senate in Committee of the Whole, that then it will be in order, as the Senator from Massachusetts has observed, not only to move an amendment, but to move an amendment in the second degree; whereas, if we deal with the amendments made in Committee of the Whole we are restricted to amendments in one single degree. That would be the second, but still it is only one. The purpose being to perfect the bill, I quite agree with the Senator from California that it will facilitate proceedings if we may by general consent or by motion take the amended bill as a substitute so as to make it a primary bill open to all the amendments which were originally in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the proposition? The Chair hears none. Is it understood that the bill remains in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. BOOTH. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That will be the understanding. The bill will be read as amended. Senators understand now, of course, that if they have amendments to suggest they will be made in the course of the reading if that is desired by them, this being considered now as the reading of the bill for amendments.

The Secretary read the first section of the bill as amended.

Mr. WINDOM. Are amendments in order at this moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They are.

Mr. WINDOM. I submit the following to come in at the end of the section, after line 20:

No recovery of damages or costs shall be had against the defendant in any suit brought for the alleged infringement of a patent by the use of any patented device, process, invention, or discovery, if it shall appear that the defendant purchased the same for his own use from the manufacturer thereof or from a dealer engaged in the open sale of the same, unless it shall also appear that the defendant at the time of such purchase had actual notice of the existence of such patent.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Is it necessary to propose amendments to each section?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is unless the Senator proposes to amend the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CONKLING. That is a very important amendment. I do not mean to intimate an objection to it, but I should like to hear it read once more.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. WINDOM. I will modify the amendment by inserting the word "private" before "use;" so as to read, "for his own private use."

Mr. CONKLING. And I ask the Senator to insert another word, "knowledge;" so as to read, "unless it appear that he had knowledge or actual notice."

Mr. WINDOM. I am entirely willing to accept that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, the object of this amendment will be very apparent, and I will not take the time of the Senate to discuss it at any length. It is intended to remedy very great wrongs which are being perpetrated under the cover of our patent law.

The law now gives to the patentee or to the purchaser of a patent a sweeping right of action against everybody. The proposed amendment takes away such right of action in the courts of the United States against innocent parties who use the invention without knowledge of its existence and who purchase the article patented in the open market from a dealer who is engaged in the sale of such articles or from the manufacturer thereof. The remedy still remains against the manufacturer and the seller. I think I am safe in saying that there are a hundred thousand patents to-day in the Patent Office of the United States for little insignificant inventions, covering every conceivable thing used in your kitchen, upon your farm, in your workshop, of which the persons buying have no means of knowledge. Now, the object of this amendment is to prevent the oppression and the great injustice that is being perpetrated upon hundreds of thousands of innocent people by means of the patent law. A common coal-stove, I am informed, is covered by at least twenty patents, almost every part of it; and your laws encourage the issue of the largest possible number of patents. If, for instance, an applicant thinks he has devised a new and useful kind of stove, and that device includes a dozen different contrivances, instead of taking out a single patent for the whole and getting a patent for that kind of stove, your laws and this bill, I believe, expressly provide that he may divide his application into different patents, giving him the opportunity after they are thus subdivided to assign one to A, another to B, another to C, and then for a single coal-stove which the poor man uses upon the prairies to keep his family from freezing a dozen men may sue him for a dozen different royalties.

I want to free him from such harassing and vexatious suits. Give the patentee his full redress against the vender, against the manufacturer, or against the man who has knowledge of the patent, but do not send him into every farm-house and cottage in this country to harass the people with vexatious suits about that of which they never could by any possibility have had knowledge. That is the object of this amendment.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, the amendment proposed by my friend, the Senator from Minnesota, would completely abolish the patent laws. It would enable any man who desired to purchase a patented steam-engine or anything of the kind to go into Canada and purchase it, and bring it here and use it at his will, without remedy to the owner of the patent; and it would enable any manufacturer who was insolvent and against whom no remedy could be possibly had to flood the country with infringements of patented inventions.

Mr. President, there is no real practical evil such as my friend, the Senator from Minnesota, supposes. There never has been any case in this country where a patent on a cook-stove or anything of that kind was divided up in the way he suggests it may be. There never has been any case where any poor man's cabin has been entered and he sued in half a dozen suits on account of any pair of tongs or any little thing of that kind that he had which was patented. In such cases the manufacturer is always sought, because the remedy against the individual who may by the use of the article have infringed the patent would be no remedy at all; it would not be worth anything to the patentee. The fears that my friend has in that respect are entirely without foundation.

As I said before, an amendment of that kind, compelling the patentee to prove that the infringer had notice of the patent, entirely abolishes and repeals his rights. It can never in any case be done. In what manner can notice be given to forty-seven millions of people? Actual notice cannot be proved. It is, in the nature of things, impossible; and this is simply, in my judgment, an amendment which would entirely prostrate the patent system to which the country owes so much, and through which this country is enabled to contest with foreign countries in the markets of the world.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be again reported as modified.

The Secretary read the amendment of Mr. WINDOM, as modified, as follows:

No recovery of damages or costs shall be had against the defendant in any suit brought for the alleged infringement of a patent by the use of any patented device, process, invention, or discovery, if it shall appear that the defendant purchased the same for his own private use from the manufacturer thereof or from a dealer engaged in the open sale of the same, unless it shall also appear that the defendant at the time of such purchase had knowledge or actual notice of the existence of such patent.

Mr. COCKRELL. At what point is that to be inserted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the end of line 20 of section 1.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the amendment by inserting at the end of it "or has continued to use the same after such notice."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. My amendment will test the desire of the mover of the original amendment. Without it any railroad corporation or wealthy manufacturer, having got possession of the invention without notice of the patent, may continue to use it in spite of the most plain and emphatic notice.

Mr. WINDOM. I certainly do not wish to accomplish that end.

Mr. HOAR. That end is accomplished by the amendment as originally proposed.

Mr. WINDOM. The only objection I see to the Senator's amendment is this: that it would reopen to some extent the evils which now exist in the great mass of cases to which I referred. Still it would be very much modified by the amendment even as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts; and if it meets the approval of the Senate I shall not object to it.

Mr. HOAR. It is very easy in proposing to change any existing law to suppose, as the Senator from Minnesota supposes, the case of some very poor or simple man on one side, and the case of some very rich man or rich corporation on the other side and to call the attention of the legislative body to a case arising between such parties as testing his principle. Now, the Senator from Minnesota proposes an amendment which strikes down the patent law of this country substantially. There is nothing of it worth having left when the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota shall be adopted, if it shall be; and he proposes to do it by supposing the case of farmers on the prairies or poor women in their kitchens with invented articles in use, and some speculator who has purchased a patent right or divided up an invention into half a dozen patents undertaking for speculative purposes to wring money out of such persons.

Well, now, that is not the case to which the patent laws of this country apply. This country has owed its prosperity to inventors more than to any other class of citizens; it has owed its fame and place among the nations of the world, it has owed its power in war and its power in peace to the inventive genius of its people. Other nations have excelled in literature; other nations have excelled in art; other nations have excelled in military capacity and in courage; but this one thing is the characteristic of the American people—the power above and beyond any other nation or any other race that ever lived on the face of the earth of calling into the service of mankind in the useful arts of life the forces of nature by inventive genius. And it is a remarkable fact that the great inventions to which the prosperity in manufactures and in the mechanic arts of this country are due have not been made by the men of science; they have not been made by the men of wealth; they have not been made by the men of education; they have not been made in the service of capitalists; but they have been made by the poor workingmen desiring to reduce the hardship of their own toil and to shorten the hours of their own labor, and in that way the great inventions have come.

At the place of my own residence, within ten miles of where I now live, was born an inventor who by a single invention doubled, by the confession of one of the great jurists of the South, the value of every acre of cotton-producing land in this country, Eli Whitney.

Mr. WINDOM. How much benefit did Whitney himself get from his invention? Did he make any money out of it?

Mr. HOAR. He got very little benefit from that particular invention, though he did from another, an invention by which he was enabled to establish the manufacture which his family have owned in the State of Connecticut. But the reason that Eli Whitney failed to reap personally was that the courts in the Southern States encountered claims for justice in the same spirit with which this amendment now encounters the just claims of every inventor in the country, and juries refused, when the sound of the cotton-gin was audible through the open windows of the court-house where they were trying the cases, to find that any of Eli Whitney's inventions were in use in any of the neighborhoods where the courts were held.

Now, Mr. President, if we wish to abolish the patent laws let us say so. If we wish to strike out from the future resources of this country, from the future resources of the agriculture of the West and of the South, from the resources of the new manufactures which are being rapidly transferred from the East to the West and to the South, the inventive genius of this people, let us do it openly by a repeal of the patent laws, but not by an amendment of this character.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, I have a very few words to say on this subject. I certainly am not disposed to repeal the patent law.

I certainly agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that invention has done a great deal for this country. I do not think it follows from either or both those propositions that the patent laws may not be properly amended and that abuses existing in them, if such do exist, should not be removed.

As I understand the amendment now under consideration, it proposes to leave to the inventor all his remedies against the man who manufactures without his consent a patented article, and all his remedies against an individual who shall sell without his consent a patented article, but it seeks to protect only those who, without knowing of the existence of his patent or that the article manufactured or sold trenches upon his patented rights, in good faith buy an article from the manufacturer or seller for their own use. It protects such purchasers against a suit for damages. The Senator from New York suggests as an amendment to the amendment the insertion of the word "knowledge."

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to make a suggestion at that point?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that it is proposed to enact that the inventor of the air-brake cannot stop a railroad company in this country from its perpetual use unless he can show that the company had knowledge or actual notice of his patent before they purchase the article from a man that manufactured it. That is the proposition.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am not opposing the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts; I am explaining what I understand to be the general purpose of the original amendment of the Senator from Minnesota. If a person after being notified that he is using a patented article and by the use of it infringing another man's rights, continues to use it, I can see reason why he should be liable to damages. I will say further to the Senator from Massachusetts that if he will insert something here that will leave the railroad men and the patentees to fight their battles out, and let the large body of our people who are neither railroad men nor patentees have the benefit of exemption from litigation, I shall not object.

But I wish the attention of the Senator from New York for a moment. At his suggestion the word "knowledge" has been inserted, so that the defendant will be liable unless at the time of the purchase he had knowledge or actual notice. I should be glad to know from the Senator from New York whether with that word inserted every man would be charged in law with a knowledge of the patent the same as he is with knowledge of the law?

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all, as I understand it. Every man is supposed to know the law. No man is supposed to know a fact of that sort. For legal purposes notice, as I understand it, may be of three kinds—actual, constructive, or presumptive; and they differ very much in their qualities. The mover of this amendment chose to select the term "actual notice." All lawyers know what that means. I proposed to change it, and to change it only in this respect: should the amendment become law, when it operates upon a man who knew in point of fact all about it, it would not be necessary to prove that actual notice had been given to that man. For example, suppose the person in question had been himself a spectator in the Patent Office when the patent was issued. Suppose he had been intimately acquainted with the patentee and had seen day after day going on before his face the manufacture of this invention. It would seem, if I may say so without offense, to be almost childish to require the law or the patentee to go and notify this man personally over again of a thing which he knew beforehand just as well as the man knew who sent somebody to notify him. In other words, my purpose was merely, taking my friend from Iowa as an illustration, where it appears to the tribunal that he knew personally all about the thing, it should not be held necessary that, in spite of that knowledge, the other party should go and give him actual notice. That is all.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the patent law and never expect to be, and I merely suggested the doubt that arose in my own mind whether or not the insertion of this word might not require every man to be construed to have knowledge by the recording of the patent in the Patent Office.

As I before said, the purpose of this amendment, as I understand it, and certainly my own purpose in supporting it, is, as I have indicated, to give to the person who in good faith buys from a party engaged in manufacturing an article or a party engaged in selling it in open market, without any knowledge that he is infringing the rights of any one, exemption from prosecution for damages, leaving the inventor to prosecute the manufacturer or the dealer. I understood the Senator from New Hampshire to say that it left the inventor without any remedy at all. Does he not have the power to enjoin the manufacturer who is engaged in manufacturing articles in violation of his patent?

Mr. WADLEIGH. Only after it has been proved by a trial, by a lawsuit, that the patent is valid and that it is infringed.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. If Senators understood as those living where the Senator from Minnesota and I live understand the effect of the existing law, it seems to me they would be diligent to help us in some way to some remedy. Take the so-called barb-wire, being extensively used now in the State where I live for fences. I do not know how many different kinds are made, each one I suppose covered by a patent. Those wires are sold by all our dealers in the county in which I live and throughout our State. Our farmers are in a measure compelled to use them for fencing their fields. They cannot know whether one man's patent is good or another man's patent is good. They cannot tell about it. They must either buy the wire and fence their fields, or leave them unfenced where lumber cannot be had. Now, is it right that the matter should run by year after year until perhaps nine-tenths of the farmers in that county shall each have their mile or two miles of barb-wire fence, and at the end of that time a patentee shall come along and say to each, "Sir, pay me so much a mile or so much a rod for the wire that you have used in violation of my patent, or you must go to Des Moines, the capital of the State, and defend a suit to be brought against you, the costs of which and the fees in which will in themselves be more than I demand of you." The thing is being done in the State of Iowa now in regard to these barb-wire fences, is being done in the State of Iowa now in regard to what is called the dry well, and our people are paying day by day $10, $15, $20, when they do not know a particle more whether they owe the man a dollar or a cent than they know what is going on in the moon, but paying the money just because it is cheaper to do it than to defend a suit under your patent law. Should they not have some protection?

I am willing to protect the inventor, but is it necessary to his prosperity that the great body of our people shall be exposed to results of this kind? Is there no common ground on which the inventor can stand, and yet the man who buys an article for his own use can also stand with some degree of safety? Is it necessary to the success of invention that the great body of our people shall be exposed to exactions of this kind and find it cheaper to pay than to defend themselves? That is the practical question. There is no hostility to inventors on the part of the people among whom I live. They derive benefit from them. Our fields are plowed with patented plows. Our fields are planted with patented planters. Our fields are reaped and mowed with patented machines. One great trouble with our people is that they buy far too many of these articles; but in doing it they are wholly unaware that they are violating any man's rights. They do not wish to violate any man's rights; and the result must be either that they will have to cease buying patented articles entirely or we must have some such remedy as this. That is the condition of affairs.

I have no desire to interfere in any contest going on between railroad companies and patentees. Railroad companies are able to take care of themselves. They are generally corporations of wealth. Many of them have attorneys in their service receiving higher salaries than the judges on the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States. They are able and willing to look into these matters and care for themselves. But it is for the individual citizen, who going into a place where an article is offered in open market for public sale, buys it, and takes it for his own use, not knowing or suspecting that he is violating the rights of any other man—it is for his sake and his only that I think an amendment embodying this idea should be adopted.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota should be adopted at all, I think it ought to be amended as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts; but I have not seen my way clear to vote for the amendment even as proposed to be amended. It will be seen that this is proposed to be attached to a limitation law applying to existing causes of action. The natural construction of the amendment, even as amended, would be that that also would apply to existing causes of action. Now, this is not the case of changing a remedy for an existing cause of action, which we have power to do, but it is the case of taking away all remedy as against parties now legally liable, which can only be had by the adjudication of a court. This is all I wish to say on the amendment.

Mr. WINDOM. Only a single word. I am not in favor of abolishing the patent system, but I want to improve it. The Senator from Massachusetts suggests that some of the great corporations that are using patented articles may under this amendment avoid payment for them. I am willing to accept any proper amendment that he may suggest upon that point; but when the Senator says that if this amendment prevails it amounts to an entire destruction of the patent system of this country, I must say that either he is mistaken or I have always misunderstood what the intent and meaning of the system is. If it means that patents bought up by speculators for a mere nominal sum may be used to plunder and oppress innocent people, who without notice of the existence of such patent have purchased articles in open market that may happen to be covered by it, and if the system itself cannot stand without the support of such intolerable abuses, I say let the system be abolished. If the Senator from Massachusetts is correct in saying that the attempt by this amendment to remedy its wrongs is an abolition of the patent system itself, I reply that it has already outlived its usefulness. I do not, however, believe that abuses of which the people so justly complain are so incorporated into the very life of the system that they cannot be removed without fatal consequences. I believe that the patent system can exist in perfection, can be as efficient for the encouragement of honest and meritorious inventors when shorn of the abuses which now exist as it can with all its present intolerable imitations and robberies clinging about it. It is to remove some of the abuses and not to injure the patentee that this amendment is proposed.

I believe I should not be overstating the case if I were to say that I could go into the Patent Office and find old patents to-day which may be bought for a song, that would enable me to bring at least a dozen well-founded suits against the Senator from Massachusetts himself. I suspect I could, and for a sixpence, buy up some old patent that under his proposition would compel him either to pay me a royalty or to strip his boots off on Pennsylvania avenue. And I suspect that if I were to examine his suspenders I could find they infringe a half dozen patents, and that under his amendment he must take them off and run the risk of walking down the street without them, or else pay several royalties. I think I could obtain enough old patents to disrobe the Senator from Massachusetts entirely, or else compel him to pay a royalty for something that is actually worthless.

I believe it is true that there is not a farmer in this country to-day who is not liable to a score of suits or more for the infringement of patents on his farming implements. There is something about his plow, his harrow, his thrasher, or his reaper, some little insignificant thing that nobody ever ought to have had a patent for, and never would upon a properly administered patent system, but which under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts would compel him to stop using such implements and to lose all he has paid for them, or pay the exorbitant demands of some patent speculator. So with everything else. There are a dozen things in your kitchen, in your library, your dining-room, your workshop, that you have innocently imagined were paid for, but which are covered by some unsatisfied patent which may at any moment form the basis of a demand which you must pay or be subjected to harassing suits in the circuit or district courts of the United States.

Now, sir, I am willing to join with the Senator from Massachusetts in any amendment he may suggest to protect the inventor against the abuse that he speaks of; but I cannot consent, so far as my vote goes, to an amendment that will compel the people of this country, the millions who are using these things innocently, to either lose their investments or pay damages and costs in the circuit courts of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator mean in his explanation, which, if not extraordinary, is a very novel one——

Mr. WINDOM. Perhaps I should get a patent for it at the Patent Office on that ground. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOAR. Does he mean that men are liable to such damages in well-founded or merely pretended suits?

Mr. WINDOM. I say this, that in many cases they would be subject to well-founded suits. By that I mean that a suit could be maintained for a technical violation of some worthless patent issued by the Government of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Do I understand the Senator to affirm that a man clothed in the ordinary dress, such as members of this body and other citizens wear, is liable to a well-founded suit for infringement of existing patents? Does he mean to make that statement?

Mr. WINDOM. Unless upon the instruments by which they were made, the processes by which they were manufactured, or some of the devices by which the boots were made, or something of that kind, the purchaser or the manufacturer has paid the patentee's royalty you would be liable.

Mr. HOAR. That is not an answer to the question. The Senator based his argument in reply to what I said on the assumption that if my amendment were to prevail and the law so amended only were to remain unchanged a man clad in the ordinary dress could be stripped of every article of clothing he had on upon Pennsylvania avenue.

Mr. WINDOM. That is a little figurative.

Mr. HOAR. I think it was. Does the Senator mean to say that he knows or has any reason to believe that there is an existing valid patent which is infringed by the use of any article that any member of this body is supposed to have on?

Mr. WINDOM. Let me answer that question.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to hear it now.

Mr. WINDOM. I am very glad the Senator has put that question, for it enables me to illustrate this thing a little more clearly than I otherwise could. There have been several patents on the manufacture of shoes. If the manufacturer has not settled with the patentee or the assignee of that patent before he made the shoes worn by the Senator from Massachusetts, a suit may be brought against him for an infringement of the patent, and the Senator says by his amendment that the party shall be liable after notice has been given. Now, suppose I am one of the patentees of the patent for pegging his boots. The manufacturer of those boots had no right to make them. I have ascertained that fact. I meet the Senator on Pennsylvania avenue. I tell him "Take off those boots. I am the patentee of the machine by which they were made, and if you do not stop using them you are liable to a suit." And under the Senator's amendment he would be liable to suit if he did not obey then and there.

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that the Senator now has the slightest knowledge or reason to believe that any such case in fact exists. He supposes that if there were a patentee who had under those circumstances a patent which the manufacturers had not paid for the use of——

Mr. WINDOM. Does the Senator think it is reasonably certain even in the case I have assumed that all the manufacturers who use these inventions have settled with the patentees? If they have not, then any one who uses them sends out into the community a manufactured article which renders every man who buys it liable precisely as I have stated.

Mr. HOAR. That supposition is what is left of the Senator's original statement.

Mr. WINDOM. I will guarantee that I can take the Senator into the Patent Office and find hundreds of patents of precisely the kind that I have named.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will allow me to remark—I did not intend to invite a colloquy or undertake the defense of this bill; it is not in my charge—that the bill remedies very thoroughly that general suggestion in a later section.

Mr. WINDOM. I should be most happy if the Senator would point it out.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to take the explanation of the bill out of the hands of the gentleman who has charge of it; but one provision which may be mentioned is the introduction of the English system which requires frequent repayment during the life of the patent by the owner, so that these old and worthless multitudes of patents will all be abolished by the operation of this bill. It is only the valuable and vital patent which will remain. That is one feature. There are other provisions in the bill also which are practical protections against that evil.

Mr. WINDOM. All there is of what the Senator now suggests in the way of protection in this bill is that after four years, if I am not mistaken, the patentee must pay an additional $50 or his patent will die, and then it may run five years longer, I think it is, and he must pay $100 more. Hence by the payment of $50 any of these patents may be kept in life nine years.

Mr. HOAR. That will sweep them all practically out of existence.

Mr. McMILLAN. Is a further amendment to the section in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Not at this stage. Two amendments are already pending. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

Mr. WADLEIGH. I desire to say that in my belief the fears of my friend, the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] are almost entirely imaginary. A singular illustration of that was given the other day. The Senator was told that under the law of the United States the constituents of the Senator from Minnesota could be dragged to a distant State for trial. There is no such provision of law. By the laws of this country suits against his constituents must be brought in the State of Minnesota. We were told that they were liable, all of them, to pay triple damages, and that was branded as an outrage. The law giving the courts the right, in their discretion, to impose triple damages has existed since 1856. There are only some seven or eight cases in all in the books in which such damages have been imposed, and these have been imposed only where the conduct of the party against whom they were imposed really deserved that they should be held liable; but this bill abolishes them entirely. The patent to which he refers is probably invalid. If it is valid, it is worth all that is asked for it to any of those men who enjoy it. If that patent is valid, there is not one of them but would be willing to give the $10 asked for the right to have a well of that kind put down. Suppose that suits are brought against them, if those suits are brought in a court of equity that court has full and plenary power to punish anything like oppression or vexation by the refusal to allow costs and by the imposition of terms. If they are brought in a court of law, I apprehend that my friend from Minnesota and his constituents have nothing to fear from the verdict of a Minnesota jury upon the facts that are notorious in those cases.

It seems to me that my friend the Senator from Minnesota, in getting up these imaginary cases to confuse the Senate, goes far beyond what anybody's experience ever has taught or ever will teach as to the evils of the patent system. How absurd to suppose that in practice any patentee will sue anybody for one pair of boots! No such case ever did occur, and no such case ever will occur in the nature of things. If any man shakes his fist in another's face in the heat of an argument, political or otherwise, a prosecution for assault and battery lies; and if every assault of that kind was punished by prosecution, the whole land would groan under the burden of such litigation. Does anybody propose, therefore, to abolish the law against assault and battery? The answer to that statement is that in practice no such evils follow, and that no change in the law is necessary. Just so with reference to this proposed law. Unless the matter is of sufficient importance to warrant any one in supposing that profit can be made by asking parties who are using the invention to pay for it, then there will be no evils of that kind. The amendment proposed by my friend the Senator from Minnesota, if adopted, would leave the law in such a way that the manufacture of patented articles would pass into the hands of insolvents.

Mr. WINDOM. Right at that point may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WADLEIGH. Certainly.

Mr. WINDOM. What becomes of the injunction to prevent insolvent manufacturers from going on with business?

Mr. WADLEIGH. No injunction ever can be granted until after a long course of litigation, and during that time the manufacturer may be manufacturing and flooding the country with the patented articles.

Mr. WINDOM. Does not the court grant an injunction at the beginning of the litigation?

Mr. WADLEIGH. Not at all.

Mr. WINDOM. In some cases I think they do.

Mr. WADLEIGH. It is only after the validity of the patent and its infringements have been proved in a suit at law that an injunction is granted.

There is another point, Mr. President. A man goes into Canada; he there manufactures articles which are patented in this country; those articles are sent into our markets and they are sold in open market, according to the language of the amendment proposed by my friend; they are bought everywhere; and where is the remedy of the poor patentee who may have devoted years to making and perfecting that invention? It would be utterly taken away from him by the amendment which the Senator proposes. The effect of that amendment would be to give to insolvents who are not responsible for the goodness of their wares and to give to foreign parties the manufacture of patented inventions in this country; and my friend the Senator from Minnesota has said that almost everything is patented, which is true. It is also true that because of that in this country we are to-day enabled to make headway against foreign manufacturers and are to-day obtaining for this country the monopoly of manufactures in the world.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 7 and the noes 25; no quorum voting.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KERNAN. I simply want to say that I propose to vote, as I did just now vote, against the amendment to the amendment, because I am opposed to the original amendment itself.

The Secretary called the roll.

Mr. ROLLINS, (who had voted in the affirmative.) I desire to withdraw my vote, as I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.]

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 31; as follows:

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

Mr. McMILLAN. I move to insert, after the closing word of the amendment of my colleague, the words "and that such purchase is an infringement of the rights of the plaintiff."

This is intended to cover and protect purchasers of patented articles in ordinary use from dealers or from manufacturers who may not have any rights under the patent of course; but unless the ordinary purchaser has some notice that in purchasing he is purchasing from a person who has no right to sell, and that it is an infringement of a patent, of course it would not be sufficient protection. This merely perfects the amendment of my colleague.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I am not a great advocate of patents, but my judgment is that we might as well repeal the entire patent law as to adopt the original amendment and the amendment to it, because men would be able certainly to use all the inventions without the user being liable. The articles could be manufactured and sold by insolvent parties. As was said by the Senator in charge of the bill, they could be manufactured in Canada, and they would destroy all our manufactures because they could sell without any royalty on paying the duty. My experience is (and I may say that the little experience I have had has been in defending people who were sued for the infringement of patents, and never in the world in prosecuting at the suit of the patentee for infringement) that there is no abuse in suing individuals who simply buy an article honestly and use it; but if you amend the bill as proposed the makers will either plead insolvency, or, being out of the country, a man will send articles in and sell them, and it would destroy not only our own manufacturers who are willing to pay a fair royalty, but it would destroy all the rights of the patentee. Therefore, while I have desired that this proposed law should be made so that it could not be used oppressively, I hope the amendment will not be adopted, for I think it would destroy all property in patents substantially.

Mr. DAWES. The rejection of the amendment to the amendment offered by my colleague and the adoption of the amendment in its present shape will put us in the attitude of authorizing one man to use for his own benefit and to control the property of another man with full knowledge of that fact. I do not think the Senate mean to do that. I am aware of the instances of hardship suggested by the Senator from Minnesota; but when a man has purchased an article which is just as much the property of an inventor as his horse or his cow or his ox, and as much more his property as the result of his mental labor is of more value to him and to the world than his physical labor, and when in purchasing it he has notice that it is the property of his neighbor, and yet insists upon continuing to appropriate that to his own use, it seems to me not to be a line of conduct that squares with honesty and fair dealing. If there can be one thing more valuable to a man than another which he has acquired it must be that which is the result of long and patient and expensive and wearing mental labor. It may be so under the complication of the patent laws that a purchaser of a product in open market may part with his property innocently, and there may be instances of hardship. The purchaser has the right, however, under the laws of the land to recover back from the man who has sold him that which is not his whatever he has paid for it. He has, in the theory of the law and in the actual practical application of it in the main, protection, not always. Instances like that which the Senator from Minnesota has related come within my own knowledge. But when an individual has notice that the horse he uses belongs to his neighbor and not to him, when he has notice that anything he uses belongs to another and not to him, it seems to me irreconcilable with any principle of honor and fair dealing that he should be permitted to continue to deprive the rightful owner of that property and of all remedy for the use of it; and that is the attitude of this amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I voted for the amendment submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] in a belief that it would improve the amendment submitted by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.] Had the amendment to the amendment, however, been adopted, I should still have voted against the amendment as amended. I voted upon that principle which always controls my vote here, I believe. I will perfect an amendment to which I do not agree, making it as acceptable as possible, making it conform to my own judgment as nearly as I can, and if I fail to accomplish an amendment which makes it so acceptable that I feel justified in voting for it, I then vote against it. I say that I would have voted against the amendment if amended. Of course I shall vote against it if not amended. I shall do so in the belief that it is a virtual abolition of all your patent system. I would not regard the existing system as worth a pound to any inventor with that provision upon it. It might be in cases, but not as a system. There are hard cases, there are cases of extreme hardship, I am fully aware, under the administration of the existing law; the Senator from Minnesota has alluded to some of them; but that hardship is hardly a sufficient justification, in my judgment, for abolishing that system of patents which has accomplishd so much in this country. Very many things that are frivolous in their nature are patented; many things that are important may look to a person who is not fully cognizant with them as frivolous which are not so in fact. A very little thing, indeed, is of great importance at times. The evils, however, which are suffered are all upon the one side. The honest patentee is driven to your courts to maintain his rights under the existing law by a class of men who systematically deprecate, who make it a studied business and profession to violate the patent law and to avail themselves of existing patents. How many cases have we had in this body where we have been asked to extend a patent because the patentee has been compelled to expend not only more than he has ever received from his patent, but an additional sum in protecting himself in that which was really his right, but which was only decided by the courts when he became an impoverished man?

It seems to me that there may be a very substantial remedy which would meet this case. We know that that department of the Government, if I may call it so, the Patent Office, is one which yields from the inventions, I think for the past few years, in round numbers, $100,000 or more annually beyond its expenses. I think the Commissioner told me within a few days that the probable surplus this year would be at least $120,000 beyond the expenditures of the office. There is a fund which has been contributed by the patentees themselves. We may wisely, we may equitably, we may justly and appropriately, I think, use that fund in protecting honest citizens from all such liability if we can, as has been suggested by the Senator from Minnesota. It seems to me that it may be substantially done by requiring that department, first, to prepare carefully a catalogue of every existing patent to-day and publish it in the Official Gazette. I am not apprised now, I do not recollect, the number of copies that each Senator and Representative is allowed to distribute, or the libraries which he is allowed to name to which that Gazette shall be distributed. My impression is that it is eight. If that Official Gazette should go into every State to the number of eight to each of its Senators and each of its Representatives, the copies would be reasonably accessible to the citizens of each State. You would find them certainly at the county seat of every county in any State; you would find them in all your large libraries. You would therefore impose no very severe tax upon the purchaser of any patented article if you ask him to observe the simple rules that all observe.

Buyer, look out for yourself. It is a maxim of law, I think, caveat emptor. I think I once learned it, but I had pretty nearly forgotten it. If we were to do that I would be happy to join in it. Let that catalogue be disseminated, scattered through every part of the country, through the Official Gazette, with the additional provision that every patent subsequently issued should also be there recorded and thus distributed, and I believe that we should thus remove almost entirely the great difficulty to which the Senate's attention has been called; but to such a sweeping amendment as that submitted by the Senator from Minnesota I cannot give my assent, and I must vote against it.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I am inclined to think every Senator wants to accomplish precisely what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] as I understand is aiming at; and on the other hand I think no Senator wants to effect that which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] seem to fear will be effected by the amendment moved by the Senator from Minnesota. Nobody here, I suspect, wants to invalidate a man's title to a method which he has invented, to a discovery which he has made. Your patent laws have undertaken to protect all such property. The business of making machinery, tools, and implements, is one business; the business of discovering methods of making them is another business. It is not always that the machine itself is covered by a patent on it, but some principle applied in the making of it may be the only subject of a patent. What the Senator from Minnesota aims at, it seems to me, is the protection of that man, be he poor or rich, who pursuing the rights of the law enacted under the powers of Congress goes to an open manufacturer or an open dealer and buys a thing, a made thing. He buys it and takes it home and applies that thing to his use, no matter what it is, whether it is a sewing-machine, or a cotton-gin, or a plow, or a drag. He finds it on the market for sale; it has a known place of manufacture, and here is a known house which has been engaged in selling it. If there is a patented principle employed in the manufacture of that thing, the man who stole the principle and incorporated it into the main made thing infringed the patent. He is the real infringer; but I believe the law holds that the man who purchases the main thing and uses it is also an infringer, and it allows the patentee to pursue each and all these parties, the man who made, the wholesale dealer or the retail dealer who sold, and the man who uses.

Mr. BOOTH. No, no.

Mr. HOWE. If allows him the alternative; it does not compel him to sue all. He takes his choice; and probably if he cannot get damages he gets costs. That would be a little hard. Both the Senators from Massachusetts say if he buys innocently he ought not to be made liable; but if the patentee after he has bought goes and tells him "this is an infringement; I have a patent on a discovery employed in the making of this thing," then his liability commences to the patentee. That forfeits the thing. That thing which he has purchased in open market and paid for becomes by the speaking of those words liable to damages.

Mr. DAWES rose.

Mr. HOWE. I will hear the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. DAWES. My suggestion is this, that he has his remedy back upon the man who sold it to him without right, precisely as the man has who obtains in open market any article of commercial property, aside from bank bills, which the man who sold to him had no right to sell to him, and which when the true owner comes along and notifies him of, all the law of the land requires him to not only stop using it, but to give it up and look to the man from whom he purchased it. He would have that remedy.

Mr. HOWE. It may be that the purchaser would have recourse over to the vendor; that may be so. I should have some hesitation in saying that it was so.

Mr. WADLEIGH. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. HOWE. I am not controverting it. But that makes the purchaser, when he has only made a fair purchase in open market, pursue his remedy against the man of whom he purchased. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has already alluded to one interest, the interest of commerce. If a bond payable to bearer is stolen, a United States bond, or a bank-note, or a bill of exchange indorsed "payable to bearer," and the property of the Senator from Massachusetts, is purchased from the man who stole it, and purchased innocently, without notice, the man who makes the purchase, I believe, gets a good title and can convey a good title; and it is no use to tell that man, after he has purchased it and paid for it, "this is stolen property; this really belongs to the Senator from Massachusetts." He does not become liable to the Senator from Massachusetts. Now, the Senator from Minnesota wants in the interest of commerce and of trade to secure to the purchaser of these patented articles just the same immunity. I think every Senator wants to afford the same protection. There is a difficulty in drawing the precise amendment which will effect that.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] has suggested an objection to the amendment as it now stands which makes a strong impression upon me, that this is not a provision to limit the effect of patents to be granted hereafter, but is an attempt to abstract something from the value or effect of patents already issued, if I understood the Senator from Michigan. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] suggested another difficulty which perhaps ought to be guarded against, and that is that if we by some provision like this give absolute protection to the man who is simply using a patented article which he had bought innocently, he may buy those articles foreign-made. The Senator from Minnesota has had his attention drawn to that subject, and I only want to call his attention to it again. I want myself to vote to confer what I understand the Senator from Minnesota aims at, and I want the measure to be so guarded as that it shall not strike down the value of patented property.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] to the amendment of his colleague, [Mr. WINDOM,] to add the words:

> And that such purchase is an infringement of the rights of the plaintiff.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

Mr. WINDOM. An amendment is in order I believe now to the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. WINDOM. I suggest the addition of these words:

> But this provision shall not apply to purchasers from foreign manufacturers or dealers.

Have I the right to modify my own amendment at this point?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. WINDOM. I modify my amendment in that way.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the object of that?

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator from New York asks what is the object of the modification. I think there may be something in what was stated by the Senator from New Hampshire, that the original amendment might enable foreign manufacturers and sellers to take advantage of our own manufacturers and dealers, and I do not wish to accomplish that.

Mr. CONKLING. What, if I may inquire, does the honorable Senator from Minnesota do with the other objection? Here are vested rights in patents. A vested right in such a thing is property; it is private property. The Senator proposes to impair it. I suggest to him in the same connection the courts have said that a grant is a contract. Letters-patent are grants from the crown or from the government. The Constitution says no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of a contract. It does not say in those words or at that place in the Constitution that the United States may not do it; but other provisions of the Constitution do point out the impropriety of sacrificing private property, and one of them says that private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation. Here is a man, Mr. Edison, for example, who has filled the world with amazement by one of his inventions. It is useful; it is wonderful; it is praiseworthy. Operating upon a patent already issued to him, the Senator proposes a section which strikes down in part, if not in whole, his right, which annihilates the very essence of his property. How does the honorable Senator dispose of that difficulty?

Mr. WINDOM. I am not sure whether there is anything in that point or not. I am quite willing to submit it to the courts if there is anything in that point.

Mr. CONKLING. To the courts?

Mr. WINDOM. I will submit it to the courts.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senate is the court, and the Senator should now submit it.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not desire anything in this amendment that is not right and in the interest both of the patentee and the public. I certainly do not wish to take from any man any vested rights, but I do desire to protect the public against the patent-knaves who are infesting this country. I am quite willing if any Senator will submit an amendment upon that point to take a vote upon it. I am not clear that it is a violation. I shall not offer the amendment myself, but if any other Senator chooses to offer it I shall not oppose it.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Will the Senator from Minnesota allow me to suggest to him that he may remove the constitutional objection by making the amendment applicable to future patents only?

Mr. WINDOM. As the Senator from New York and the Senator from Michigan, in whose legal judgment and knowledge I have the greatest confidence, believe that this would be a violation of private rights, if the Senator from Michigan will offer such an amendment as will guard against that I will not oppose it. I will offer another amendment following that which I think will not be subject to the objection that this is, and will accomplish the same object to some extent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] as modified by himself.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I object to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota upon constitutional ground. The Constitution gives to Congress the right to grant to inventors for a limited time an exclusive right to the use of their inventions. That is all that can be given, and that must be given or nothing. My friend, the Senator from Minnesota, proposes that they shall have what? That their grant shall be what? Does it purport to be the grant of the right to an exclusive use of their invention? Not at all: but that anybody who purchases their invention under certain circumstances shall have the right to use it. It proposes to take away from inventors a large share of what is granted to them under the Constitution, and what alone the Constitution allows them to have.

In my judgment the modification made by the Senator from Minnesota to his amendment does not meet the difficulty at all. It is almost impossible to meet that difficulty. Let me tell the Senator why. This excepts only from the operation of his amendment a purchase made from a foreign dealer or manufacturer. What will be the obvious course of business for foreign manufacturers or for manufacturers who may remove their business to Canada for the purpose of taking advantage of patents in which they have no interest? They make their wares; they sell them to some person who is in league with them in this country. That person conveys them by sale to the hands of large dealers in the cities, not foreign dealers at all nor foreign manufacturers, but the wares are foreign and the person who procured those wares in that way, which would be inevitable if this should become the law, would have the right to sell those foreign manufactured goods, to make use of patented inventions to which he had no right in this country, and to drive our own manufacturers from the market. If there is an ingenious way to kill American manufactures, if there is an ingenious way to put this country behind others in the race of progress in manufactures and in the invention of manufacturing machinery, that proposed by my friend, it seems to me, would be exactly the course. For these reasons I am opposed to the amendment.

There is another remark which I wish to make as to the rights of purchasers who have bought articles in the open market, in dealing, and in perfect innocence. The person who has sold them those articles is guilty of appropriating to himself what does not belong to him. For that he is liable. He is liable to the patentee whose rights he has infringed or he is liable to that individual to whom he has sold a patented invention, having no right. Upon which of these two parties should we place the burden of seeking the remedy against the man who has thus acted? Shall we put it upon the patentee who knows not that man at all, who has no part in the transaction, who has no way of preventing it, who cannot abstain from it, who was an entirely innocent victim, and who in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand could not obtain the necessary proof against the individual who sold, or upon the individual who picks out the man of whom he buys, who knows or has an opportunity to know his responsibility, who has at hand the proof to present against him who can abstain from buying if he chooses, and who has within his own hands entirely and for all purposes the opportunity to obtain that redress which such a law would practically deny to the inventor?

Mr. HOWE. An amendment is now in order to the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the amendment by inserting in line 3, after the word "patent," the words "hereafter issued;" so as to read:

> No recovery of damages or costs shall be had against the defendant in any suit brought for the alleged infringement of a patent hereafter issued by the use of any patented device, process, invention, or discovery, &c.

Mr. WADLEIGH. There is another point of view in which it seems to me that the burden should not be placed upon the innocent patentee who has no means of knowing who sells. My friend the Senator from Minnesota expresses the wish, in which I join, to prevent the oppressions of patent-knaves. If he will turn to the fourteenth section of this very bill he will find a provision which punishes those men criminally with severe punishment. The man who purchases an article knows of whom he buys. He has in his own hands the sword with which to mete out punishment if these knaves trespass upon his right; but the patentee can have no knowledge of that; he has no proof of it; he cannot take advantage of this section, and it furnishes to him not one tithe of the protection that it affords to the man who purchases the infringement.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I may not understand the force of the amendment. If I understand the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota it is designed to protect purchasers of articles for which there is a patent, though the purchase may be made in open market or of some person who had no right to manufacture the article. If I understand the purport of the Senator's amendment it is that. I should like to be informed if that is its purport.

Mr. WINDOM. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not distinctly understand him.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I say I understand the purport of the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota to be that it is designed to protect the purchasers of any article in open market or from a manufacturer if the article has been manufactured in violation of a patent.

Mr. WINDOM. That is its purport.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then I am in favor of that amendment, and I am opposed to the amendment to it offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] which proposes to limit that protection to the infringement of patents hereafter to be issued. It does seem to me, and it has always seemed to me, to be a hardship when any man went into open market to purchase an article, not knowing whether it had been manufactured by an infringement of somebody's patent or not, that the purchaser should be punished. I shall vote, therefore, for the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota and against the amendment proposed to it by the Senator from Wisconsin. I would not do injustice to any patentee, but let him have his remedy against the man who violates his patent, not a remedy against the innocent man who has purchased in the open market an article which has been manufactured under an infringement of the patentee's right.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the question which is presented by the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota attracted my attention when this bill was undergoing revision in the Committee on Patents. I made the point before the committee very much in the same manner that the Senator from Minnesota has made it here. The committee took it under careful consideration, and compared that proposition with all the rest of the frame of this bill, and they have gone as far as they could see their way under the Constitution in trying to give relief against the cases which are covered by the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

It is true that it strikes one at the first impression as being a very great hardship that a man who buys in the open market an article which is the subject of a patent granted for a useful invention, it may be something that is almost concealed in its nature, and who should buy in good faith and without any intention of infringement of the rights of any person whatever, should be made to pay damages or penalties for having unwittingly bought and used such a patented article. He has, however, a remedy against the vendor who has sold to him a patented article without giving him notice, or who has sold it under an infringement of an existing patent. His remedy under the law is for compensation against his vendor. But there is more than one element in the right covered by a patent. There is an element of property there which I understand to be protected by the Constitution of the United States. When the patent has issued, and so long as it remains unrevoked, it is the authority of the Government of the United States that the patentee shall enjoy the exclusive right to the use of the patented invention. When the Constitution gives a man this right, how are we going to take it away from him by law? When another person enjoys the use of that invention, whether he does it innocently or whether he does it, you may say, in fraud or in actual infringement of the rights of the patentee, it is none the less true that the patentee suffers in the loss of his property—he suffers in the loss of that which the Constitution of the United States has made property and protects by its own guarantee.

If Senators will recur to the second section of this bill, which is an elaborate section, and which has been worked out after the most laborious and painful investigation, they will find that a great deal of relief is given in that section against the very difficulty which is spoken of by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senator to state again what section it is he refers to as covering the point suggested by my amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Section 2. By looking at part of that section, commencing in line 30, on page 5, of the print I have before me, it will be seen that we have made a provision which was intended to prevent vexatious litigation and also vexatious and trivial defenses:

> And whenever the court shall be of opinion that the suit of the plaintiff, or the defense of the defendant, was vexatious and malicious, or the infringement was willful, the court may award against the defeated party such sum, by way of counsel fees and expenses of suit, as it shall deem just and reasonable.

That provision of course is intended to prevent vexatious litigation on the part of either of the persons engaged in this matter of the infringement of patents or in the matter of bringing vexatious suits against persons who have innocently used patented inventions.

By recurring to the preceding parts of that section it will be seen that compensation is given to a patentee upon the principle that a license fee is the true measure of damages for the infringement of any patented invention, and a license fee is to be ascertained first by the user of the patent, by the plaintiff in the action, he who is suing for the infringement of the patent. If there is what is termed here a reasonable number of cases, that is, a number of cases that would establish a use on the part of the plaintiff in the action that a certain license fee has been established, then that is the measure of his damages against any defendant. If no such license fee or no such usage has occurred as will establish a license fee in that way, then it is for the court and the jury, or rather I may say more strictly for the jury, to say what under all the circumstances of the case would be a reasonable fee or license for the use of the patented invention. I believe that the committee have gone just as far in the direction of the protection of the persons who innocently use patented inventions as the Constitution of the United States will warrant us in going.

There was an earnest effort on the part of many members of the committee, indeed I may say of all the committee, to go as far in this direction as we could go, at the same time saving the patentees all their rights under the protection of the Constitution of the United States. We could not feel authorized or warranted in going to any extent to deprive the patentee of the value of the proper use of his invention for sale or for any other disposition that he saw proper to make of it. It is because I consider that the second and subsequent sections of this bill do provide as far as we are able to provide a protection for those who unwittingly or innocently use patented inventions that I now find myself compelled to vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. This is a very important bill, and every amendment to it is very important. I think that the Senate is hardly paying sufficient attention to this matter. They would be probably to-morrow morning better able to dispose of it, and I therefore move to go into executive session.

Mr. WINDOM. I believe that motion is not debatable; but if this bill is to be laid aside there is an appropriation bill ready, and there is also an appropriation bill from the House on the table which I desire to have referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CONKLING. This is not in order. The bill does not lose its place by our going into executive session. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota was proceeding by unanimous consent to make some observations on appropriation bills.

Mr. WINDOM. I have stated all I desire.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ANNA M. CLIPPINGER.

On motion of Mr. WALLACE, it was Ordered, That the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 1304) granting a pension to Anna M. Clippinger was postponed indefinitely be reconsidered, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITION.

Mr. VOORHEES presented a memorial of John J. Key and W. G. M. Davis, praying the passage of a law referring their claim for compensation for services rendered the United States as attorneys at law to the Court of Claims for adjudication; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 5682) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for transportation of mails by railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

THOMAS STRIDER.

Mr. McMILLAN. This morning I made an adverse report from the Committee on Claims upon the bill (H. R. No. 3734) for the relief of Thomas Strider, and it was indefinitely postponed. I ask that the motion indefinitely postponing the bill be reconsidered and the bill placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS.) It is so ordered in the absence of objection.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. OGLESBY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1540) for the relief of Emanuel Klauser; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ROLLINS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1541) to provide for additional maps of the battle of Gettysburgh; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1542) to provide for the erection at Montgomery, Alabama, of a post-office, United States court-room, land office, and other offices; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 5312) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. WINDOM, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the committee on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice-President.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 5231) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. WINDOM, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the committee on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice-President.

PREVENTION OF EPIDEMIC DISEASES.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 210, providing for the expenses of the investigation ordered by the Senate and the House of Representatives as to the prevention of the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases in the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS.) The joint resolution being on the table, the Chair will lay it before the Senate.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 210) making an appropriation for the purpose of paying the necessary expenses incurred in investigating the origin and causes of epidemic diseases in the United States was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee asks the Senate now to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I suppose Senate bill No. 300 will be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the Chair. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution appropriates $50,000 for the purpose of paying the necessary expenses that may be incurred in investigating the origin and causes of epidemic diseases, especially yellow fever and cholera, and the best methods of preventing their introduction and spread in the United States, as provided for by resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives, the same, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended, one-half by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and one-half by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, under the direction of the Senate and House committees on epidemic diseases acting concurrently.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

USE OF TROOPS.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1492.

Mr. WINDOM. As the Senator has the floor, I will simply say that when he concludes the business he now has I shall ask the Senate to take up the pension appropriation bill, which involves no additional appropriations by way of amendment, and I am sure it will not require ten minutes' time of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska moves the consideration of Senate bill No. 1492. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1492) to amend section 15 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1878.

The bill declares that the provisions of the fifteenth section of "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1878, shall not be construed as applying to, nor be enforced against, the Army of the United States, or any part thereof, employed in the protection of life and property in the States and Territories subject to Indian incursions.

Mr. COCKRELL. There are some amendments reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was about to have the amendment of the committee reported.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs was, in line 10, after the word "States," to insert the words "of Nebraska, Kansas, and Colorado."

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to amend by adding the word "Oregon" after "Colorado."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope the Senator will also include Nevada and Minnesota.

Mr. MITCHELL. I also include Nevada and Minnesota if the Senator wishes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those are included by unanimous consent.

Mr. MITCHELL. Senators can move their own amendments. I simply confine my amendment to Oregon and Nevada.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President, the necessity for this bill will be better stated by the letters I send to the desk to be read than by any speech on my part.

The Secretary read the following letters:

OMAHA, December 2, 1878.

DEAR SIR: We beg to call your attention to the present condition of Indian affairs in the northern and western portions of our State. Within the last ten or fifteen days the agency Indians from Spotted Tail, and possibly from Red Cloud, camp have commenced depredations on the stock interests, and are stealing and running off the horses from the cattle ranges, and they have already taken quite a large number of horses from various parties, and have also in some instances killed cattle, and several herders have been wounded. We are, as we believe reliably, informed that demands have been made at the agency for stolen stock held by Indians, but they refused to surrender same, and unless this state of things is remedied at an early date it must lead to serious complications and ultimately to very great loss if not total destruction to our stock-raising interest, which is fast becoming one of the most important interests of this State as well as of the West generally. We would therefore suggest that it would be greatly to the interest of all this western country if the law prohibiting the military authorities from interfering with civil cases could be suspended, as we have a large district of very sparsely settled country occupied mainly by cattle interests, and throughout this portion of the country are scattered very many desperate characters who prey on both whites and Indians and cause much disturbance, and the civil authorities are too weak or too remote to cope with them; hence the necessity of giving the military authorities power to deal with them where civil authorities are not at hand, and we hope you will make an effort to have the law modified as indicated.

Very truly, yours,

W. A. SHARP.
W. A. PAXTON.
B. A. SHEIDLEY & BROS.
JAMES CREIGHTON.
JOHN A. CREIGHTON.
COE & CARTER.
KOUNTZE, YATES & CO.

Hon. A. S. PADDOCK.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., December 12, 1878.

MY DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt from you of what amounts to a petition to Congress to repeal the fifteenth section of the act of Congress approved June 18, 1878. I recognize the great importance of protecting and encouraging the growing and most valuable cattle interest in Nebraska; but with the most profound respect for yourself and for Congress, do not see how soldiers can do impossibilities with both hands and feet tied. Should Indians or white desperadoes come into Nebraska from the Indian country north, you make it a fine of $10,000 and imprisonment for two years if the soldiers help your sheriff. Now our officers do not usually have $10,000 handy about them, nor do I feel disposed to advise them to spend a couple of years in your penitentiary by trying to help your sheriff to arrest and punish these horse and cattle thieves. On the other hand, in the Indian country the soldiers can only act on the application of the Indian agents, and these Indian agents think that your constituents steal the ponies and cattle of their Indians; so we soldiers occupy a most unpleasant position and I prefer to sign my name to the petition itself, for I sympathize sincerely and deeply with Messrs. Sharp, Creighton, and others who desire to add to the wealth and prosperity of our nation; but must frankly say that the law takes away from the Army the only legitimate way of helping them, by supplying the sheriffs of the border counties the necessary posse comitatus to make arrests. It would be a waste of money to establish any new posts, because the Indians and cattle thieves know the law as well as we do, and laugh at the soldiers who are forbidden to help the peace officers of your State.

With great respect,

W. T. SHERMAN, General.

Hon. A. S. PADDOCK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JURORS' OATH.

Mr. BECK. I move that the bill (S. No. 1505) to repeal sections 820 and 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which we had under discussion this morning, be referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill known as the invalid and other pensions bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 5501) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1880.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, let me say a single word. The committee have added nothing in money to this bill. The amendments proposed by the Committee on Appropriations merely transpose certain clauses of the bill in order to make it more convenient for bookkeeping purposes in the Department, and in order to classify better, as they believe, some of the expenditures under it. I ask that the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read at length.

Mr. WINDOM. And let the amendments be acted upon in the bill as they are reached.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 10, before the word "widows," to insert "and;" in line 11, after "1812," to strike out "and for fees of examining surgeons, as provided by the several acts of Congress;" and in line 12, after the word "million," to strike out "six" and insert "four;" so as to make the item read:

For pensions for Army invalids, widows, minors, and dependent relatives, survivors of the war of 1812, and widows of the war of 1812, $28,400,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 13, after the word "provided," to strike out:

That a fee of $1, and no more, shall be paid to the examining surgeon for each examination of a pensioner, as provided by law, except when the examination is made by a board of surgeons, in which case the fees now allowed by law shall be paid: And provided further,

So as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the amount expended for each of the above items shall be accounted for separately.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 23, after the word "twenty," to strike out "five thousand" and insert "seven thousand five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For pay and allowances for salary, fees for preparing vouchers, rent, fuel, light, and postage on official matter directed to the Departments and bureaus at Washington, $227,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 26, after the word "relatives," to strike out "and for fees of examining surgeons, as provided by the several acts of Congress;" and in line 27, after the word "thirty," to strike out "eight thousand five hundred" and insert "four thousand;" so as to make the item read:

For Navy pensions to invalids, widows, and dependent relatives, $534,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 29, after the word "pensions," to strike out "and other expenditures under that head;" so as to read:

Provided, That the appropriations aforesaid for Navy pensions shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund, so far as the same may be sufficient for that purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from lines 35 to 38, as follows:

For pay and allowances for salary, fees for preparing vouchers, rent, fuel, light, and postage on official matter directed to the Departments and bureaus at Washington, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 38, to insert:

For fees of examining surgeons, as provided by the several acts of Congress, $204,500: Provided, That a fee of $1, and no more, shall be paid to the examining surgeon for each examination of a pensioner, as provided by law, except when the examination is made by a board of surgeons, in which case the fees now allowed by law shall be paid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT BONDS.

Mr. DORSEY. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 5683.

The Secretary read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 5683) to amend an act approved June 20, 1878, and to fix the rate of interest on bonds authorized by said act to be issued by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. WHYTE. Has that been referred to any committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that the bill has been twice read and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, from which it is now reported. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think that had better go over; it is an important bill, and we have a thin Senate now.

Mr. DORSEY. At the last session of Congress provision was made in the sundry civil appropriation bill for the payment of $281,000 of the bonds of the District of Columbia which fall due on the 1st of January and 1st of March next. By an omission in the enrollment of that bill at another place, the rate of interest on the new bonds was left out. This has prevented arrangements for their issue. Some of the outstanding bonds will be due now within two weeks, and no provision whatever has been made for their payment. This bill simply corrects that error, and provides for the issuance of other bonds to redeem those which fall due on the 1st of January and on the 1st of March; and it is very important that it should be passed at once, so that the commissioners may be able to issue the new bonds and redeem the old ones.

Mr. KERNAN. What is the rate of interest on the old bonds?

Mr. DORSEY. The rate of interest on the old bonds, I understand, is 7 per cent. The rate of interest provided for in this bill is 6 per cent. if the commissioners find it necessary to pay 6 per cent. in order to sell the bonds at par.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. I reserve the right to object after hearing the bill read. I should like to hear it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read at length for information, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. KERNAN. It is impossible for any one to vote understandingly on this bill without examining the laws. As I understand the bill was only referred this morning and is reported back to-day, I think it will have to lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. KERNAN. Yes, sir. Let it be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at three o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPRINT OF BILLS.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad to ask that bills H. R. No. 4158, H. R. No. 4307, H. R. No. 4398, and H. R. No. 4399 be reprinted for the use of the committee.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. PAGE. I demand the regular order.

EPIDEMIC DISEASES.

Mr. YOUNG. I rise to make a privileged report. I am directed by the House committee appointed to investigate epidemic diseases to offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask that it be put upon its passage.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the sum of $50,000 be appropriated out of any money now in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of paying the necessary expenses that may be incurred in investigating the origin and causes of epidemic diseases, especially yellow fever and cholera, and the best method of preventing their introduction and spread in the United States as provided for by resolutions of the Senate and House of Representatives; this sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended, one-half by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and one-half by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, under the direction of the Senate and House committees on epidemic diseases acting concurrently.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to offer an amendment to that resolution.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield for an amendment by his colleague?

Mr. YOUNG. I will allow my colleague to offer the amendment, but may probably have a word or two to say about it.

The amendment offered by Mr. ATKINS was read, as follows:

Add to the resolution these words:
Provided, That no part of this sum hereby appropriated shall be used in the employment of more than seven experts.

Mr. ATKINS. I think there should be some limit in the employment of these experts; otherwise we will have another call for another appropriation, in my opinion. It seems to me that already the sum is very large. Of course I would not object to twice the sum, or ten times the sum, if it were necessary to accomplish the object; but it does seem to me the sum already indicated in that resolution is extraordinarily large, and if the committee is to be at liberty to employ as many experts as it chooses we will be certain to have another application.

Mr. YOUNG. I am not authorized by the committee to accept any amendment, though I have no great objection to the one offered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not demand the previous question.

Mr. YOUNG. I am willing to have the amendment considered by the House and shall be content with its action.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will submit the amendment.

Mr. YOUNG. It may be proper for me to say that the committees of the Senate and House have had this matter under advisement for several days, and have calculated the expense on the facts given them by officers of the House who are familiar with the character of the business they will have to transact, and the probable expense that will be incurred.

Mr. BURCHARD. If the gentleman will permit me, I wish to say that I think an appropriation ought to be made as is provided for by this resolution, but I desire to suggest to the chairmen of the respective committees who are taking charge of the matters that the form ought to be a bill, an act, instead of a concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. This is a joint resolution, which is equivalent to a bill, and requires the signature of the President, of course, before any money is taken out of the Treasury.

Mr. BURCHARD. The resolution is in this form:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.)

The SPEAKER. The form of the resolution has been changed, so that it is now a joint resolution.

Mr. YOUNG. The committee, after a very careful examination of all the facts before them which would enable them to form a judgment as to the probable amount that would be necessary, have concluded that $50,000 is not too great an appropriation to be made, not that the whole amount will necessarily be expended, but to guard against the possibility of being stopped in the midst of the work and have to ask another appropriation. We have therefore deemed it better to ask for $50,000 at once. In reference to the amendment offered by my colleague from Tennessee, I have only this to say: by the terms of the two resolutions, that of the Senate and that of the House, each one of the committees is authorized to employ seven experts. I was of opinion myself that it was not contemplated by either the House or the Senate when those resolutions were adopted that more than seven should be employed between the two committees; and in a joint meeting of the committees I took that view. I was of opinion that seven would be sufficient, but the committee differed from me, and have agreed to employ thirteen. It is for the House to say now whether the amendment shall be adopted or not.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand the gentleman to say that in his opinion seven are sufficient.

Mr. YOUNG. That is my opinion; but as I have already said a large majority of the committee differed with me, and I shall not urge the House to adopt my view of the matter. In presenting the resolution I am only the agent of the committee, and act under its instructions. I am anxious that the investigation shall be conducted in the most thorough manner, but without incurring any unnecessary expense, and I think it can be done by seven experts as easily and as well as by a larger number. I have some fear that we will find it a more difficult undertaking to secure harmony among thirteen doctors than to endure yellow fever and cholera both. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say if the committees on the yellow-fever epidemic are to do any efficient work which will be of any value, they will require to reach some conclusion that will enable them to bring in something here for legislative action before many weeks; and if we have so large a number of experts as thirteen to assist the subcommittees that are to go down to the infected districts we will simply be overwhelmed with the multitude of counselors. I believe seven would be sufficient to put the committees in readiness for work much better than if they were incumbered with so many. With the multitude of counselors which thirteen would give I think we would find more confusion than safety. I hope the amendment will prevail. If that should prevail, I think the whole appropriation would not be used.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

Mr. YOUNG. Some other members of the committee want to say something, and I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER.]

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee which reports the resolution, I desire to say to the House that the inclination of my mind was to concur with the view entertained by the chairman of the House committee, namely: that the number of seven experts was sufficient for the purpose of enabling the committee intelligently to determine the character and scope of the legislation which should be adopted to effect the ends contemplated in the creation of this committee.

It will be remembered by the House that while the Senate refused to concur in the resolution which was passed in this House that proposed to limit the number of experts to seven, the Senate went on subsequently and created its own committee, creating also seven experts, and that forced the necessity for this House to create a committee of its own; and it will be found by reference to the terms of the resolution adopted in the House that the committee appointed by the House was authorized to employ seven experts. When the two committees met, as they did meet by the invitation of the Senate committee, for the purpose of conferring together upon the subject-matter intrusted to them, as to what should be the scope and extent of their authority, a committee was appointed on the part of the Senate committee and another on the part of the House committee, which met on two successive nights, to shape out, first, the programme of proceedings of the two committees; secondly, the number of experts that it might be necessary to employ to aid them in reference to the legislation they had in view.

When these committees met I say the inclination of my own mind was to concur with the chairman of the committee of the House in regard to seven experts as sufficient, but we took into consideration that the subject of inquiry must necessarily be at the very threshold of this investigation, first as to whether or not this disease is an exotic, or whether it is indigenous to our own country and liable to production here.

We found that this great question upon which medical men in this country, and especially in the city of New Orleans, where their experience on this question had been greater than elsewhere and their investigations had extended over a greater number of years than in any other portion of our country—we found the first question was to ascertain what the medical sentiment of the country was upon the question as to whether or not it is a transportable disease, subject to be brought in in the holds of vessels or by the shipment of goods or passengers from those regions of the world which, like Vera Cruz and Havana, may be said to be the native home of yellow fever; and therefore it was the gentlemen of the committee, acting together, thought that it was all-important that they should have the opinion of scientists and men all over our country who had given study and thought to this subject; and hence we thought it was important that we should have a physician from Boston, one from Philadelphia, and one from New York and other points on the Atlantic coast, where the extraordinary phenomenon was presented this last season of the prevalence of the fever along the line of the Mississippi River and the great railroad that spans the continent north and south from New Orleans to New York, while on the Atlantic coast from the capes of Florida to the capes of North Carolina not a single case of yellow fever was found, although in former years it had prevailed in Savannah, Charleston, and Pensacola, and in other Atlantic cities to an alarming extent, and at times even at Norfolk, Virginia.

We thought it important, therefore, that we should have a sufficient number of experts, embracing the whole country, who should pass upon this first great question of investigation; and then it is important that we should have the concurrent sentiment of the intelligence of the medical profession of this country in order that we might say we are authorized by the concentrated opinion of these people to say that a quarantine established from Boston to Galveston might be able to exclude this terrible epidemic which at stated periods has devastated our country and in the last season extended so far in the Northwest.

We believe, therefore, that it would be a judicious expenditure of the money of the country to employ a sufficient number of these experts intelligently to advise the committee so that it may arrive at just and proper conclusions. It was thought by some gentlemen of the committees, both of the Senate and of the House, that there ought to be a national board of health which should be permanent in its character and should not exist simply for a season. These experts it is simply contemplated shall render services to the committees and subcommittees that visit the localities recently afflicted and render such assistance to the committees as they can. But while it was thought by some that there ought to be a permanent board of health the necessity of legislation now at this session of Congress, the necessity of prompt action during the short session of Congress, in order that we may shut out this fever in the coming season made it impossible to adopt a plan by which a permanent board could be provided for; and in order that we might be intelligently guided by experts and the question whether the disease is exotic or indigenous to the country might be settled, we thought it well enough to embrace a large number of the profession extending all over the country, for intelligence in reference to this subject is not confined to those who had practical experience of it but is largely possessed by scientists throughout the country who have made it a matter of study.

There are men of very great eminence in Boston, there are men of very great eminence in Vermont, who have made this character of diseases a subject of especial study. It was thought proper, therefore, that we should have medical men from every portion of the country acting as experts, because these resolutions creating these committees and assigning their duties to them contemplated a measure of relief which looked in some degree to an interference with that commerce which stretches along the Atlantic coast from the docks of New York to the docks of Galveston. Hence it was deemed important to so extend this inquiry as to obtain the best information and intelligence on the subject. The expenditure of a few dollars was not to be considered in comparison with the great national objects had in view.

Therefore it was that the two committees, in joint meeting this morning, the committee of the Senate and the committee of the House, recommended these additional experts beyond what was originally recommended by the House. It will be remembered that the resolution of the Senate of itself, not a concurrent or a joint resolution, but the simple resolution of the Senate, contemplated the appointment of seven experts for that committee, as also did the resolution of the House. The resolution now before the House provides for even a smaller number than the two resolutions of the Senate and House together provided for.

The resolution adopted by the Senate is as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate, That a select committee of seven Senators be appointed by the President of the Senate to investigate and report the best means of preventing the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases, especially yellow fever and cholera, within the limits of the United States; that said committee be allowed a clerk and, if in the course of its investigations it is found necessary, a stenographer; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to employ experts and scientists, not to exceed seven in number, and send them to, and by subcommittee visit, recently infected localities, for the purpose of obtaining the fullest and most accurate information; and that said committee may report by bill or otherwise.

And that said committee have power to sit and act in concurrence with any similar committee of the House of Representatives.

The following is the resolution adopted by the the House:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That a commission is hereby authorized and constituted, to consist of four (4) Senators, to be appointed by the Senate; five (5) members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker; and experts not exceeding seven (7) in number, to be selected by and associated with them, with authority to determine the time and place of meeting, to employ stenographers and clerks, to take testimony, and by subcommittees to visit the recently infected localities and other places, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the recent history and the means of prevention and arrest of yellow fever and other epidemic diseases, and to report the facts and their opinions and recommendations by bill or otherwise, at any time.

Mr. ATKINS. I certainly have no objection to a sufficient appropriation for an examination into the causes and proper treatment of this dreadful scourge; but I desire to be practical, and I desire the House to be practical on this question. In the original resolution by the House, providing that only seven experts should be employed, it was not intended or expected that the Senate would also act upon the subject and appoint a committee of its own. It seems, however, that the Senate has done the same as the House has done.

In my judgment the concurrent action of the Senate committee and the House committee dispenses with the necessity of more than seven experts. The resolution for the House committee contemplated only seven, and the resolution of the Senate committee contemplated only seven, and that was when they did not expect to act concurrently. Now that they expect to act concurrently I do not see why seven experts would not serve the concurrent committee as well as they would serve a separate committee of the Senate or a separate committee of the House. For that reason I have offered the amendment, and I trust the House will adopt it, as I believe seven experts will be a sufficient number to perform this service.

Mr. ITTNER. I am disposed to concur with the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER,] a member of this committee, and a gentleman who has taken a very deep interest in this subject from its inception. I cannot see why it is proper, right, or judicious to circumscribe this committee in its action.

A spirit of economy is quite commendable in its place. But in dealing with a question of this kind it seems to me that the question of economy should not enter into its consideration. Some of the members of the committee are of the opinion that seven experts are quite sufficient for the purpose of this investigation. Others of the committee, equally well informed upon the subject, are of the opinion that seven may not prove to be sufficient. Now I, as a member of this House, am disposed to vote for the largest latitude to be given to this committee in their investigation of this important subject.

I do not think that this House should be confined in its action or have its action based upon a fear that this appropriation may be exhausted in the end. As a member of this House I am willing, if an appropriation of $50,000 is not enough, to give this committee sufficient means to enable them to get at the bottom of this subject and to fully investigate into the cause and effect of this great scourge which has so devastated the southern portion of our country, where it prevailed during the last few months. If $50,000 is not sufficient, then I am in favor of voting an additional $50,000 for the purpose. I hope this committee will not be circumscribed in its action, and I trust that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] will not be adopted.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. If science had fully mastered the causes of this terrible scourge that now stands prominently in the minds of members of this House and of the country, then one scientific expert would be sufficient and his opinion and his detailing to the committee all the results which the scientific world have obtained would be sufficient. But the world is not satisfied as to what is the cause of this terrible scourge; it is not agreed as to the mode by which the scourge may be avoided.

For that reason I am in favor of leaving in the hands of the committee the power to call scientific men from more than one locality. I would have men from New Orleans to say what has been their observation and their experience in that city. I would have men from Memphis, from Charleston, from Wilmington, from Philadelphia, New York, and Saint Louis, to the end that combining the observations from a large extent of country under a great variety of circumstances in different climes and during different years they might bring together a mass of facts from which we can judge as well as the scientific men themselves. If they are not to do this, then the committee is utterly unnecessary. If the committee is not to bring back here more than we now know or than any one of these scientific men knows, then there is no occasion to raise such a committee.

Having raised the committee, I would give to it the power to collect every intelligent observation upon the subject of this terrible scourge that has been made in the country for the last fifty years.

Mr. SINGLETON. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. To insert such an amendment in this resolution would present quite an anomaly. We are annually spending thousands of dollars upon investigations into the causes of the hog cholera, the cattle disease, the cotton-worm, the locust of the Northwest; and surely the adoption of any measure looking to the preservation of human life is much more valuable than obtaining information on any of these topics. To cripple the committee by such an amendment would, it seems to me, be going but half way in this work. In addition to the loss of human life, we are losing hundreds of millions of dollars of capital by the continued prevalence of this disease. Unless something can be done, and that very soon, to protect the southern country against the renewed ravages of this plague, the whole South will be of very little value to this country. The truth is, if the yellow fever should be permitted to prevail there continuously for two or three years, as it has within the last year, that section of country will be abandoned except perhaps by the colored race. I know gentlemen having large capital invested at Memphis and other points of the South who declare that it will be impossible for them to remain there if subjected to annual visits of yellow fever; that they have at best but three or four months in the year in which their capital can be profitably employed; and if the yellow fever is permitted to prevail during these months they must remove with that capital to other points. It is important, therefore, on the ground of health as well as in a pecuniary point of view, that all the resources of science and medical skill should be brought to bear for the purpose of investigating the causes of this disease.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] will permit me, I want to say at once that if gentlemen who live in that part of the country where the yellow fever has been prevailing are of opinion that it will be wiser to allow the employment of thirteen experts, I shall cheerfully defer to their wishes. In naming seven I merely expressed my own opinion; I would not by any means go against the opinion of the committee. If it appears in the course of this debate that gentlemen from the South, more familiar with this subject than we are, think that a larger number will be necessary, I shall ask all my friends to vote with them, although my own judgment suggested that seven would be enough.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman will allow me to supplement his statement with a single remark. If ten thousand experts should be necessary to preserve the health of the people, I should not object to their employment. I think, however, that seven will do as well as thirteen.

Mr. SINGLETON. Just one word more and I shall be through. This scourge assumes different forms and types in different localities; and hence it is absolutely important that men representing every section where the disease has prevailed should compare notes and interchange opinions in order to arrive at the true character of the disease. This comparison of views will, I have no doubt, tend greatly to prevent a recurrence of the disease.

Mr. GOODE. I hope that the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. ATKINS] will be voted down. He says (and I have no doubt that this remark truly represents his feelings) that if the employment of ten thousand experts were necessary, he, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, would vote for the employment of that number.

Now, allow me to suggest to him that these two committees, representing the House and the Senate respectively, to whom this matter has been referred, have given the subject the fullest consideration; they have been in session daily and nightly ever since their appointment; and after full conference and a free interchange of opinion these two committees have jointly come to the conclusion that the number of experts suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations would not be sufficient. I take it that the House will be disposed to defer to the committee having this matter in charge. It is not to be supposed that the Committee on Appropriations are as well advised on this subject as the particular committee who have already been investigating it.

Coming from a section of country which was terribly ravaged by the yellow fever in 1855, having lost in the short space of three months about one-fourth of its population, I will say that there is no subject which can claim the attention of this Congress in which the people whom I represent take a livelier and deeper interest. In their judgment, as in the judgment of the committee on this subject, the preservation of the public health and the safety of the lives of the people override all mere monetary considerations. What is an expenditure of $50,000 in comparison with the valuable information which may be gathered by selecting experts from Boston and Philadelphia and New York and Norfolk and Savannah and Charleston and New Orleans and Memphis and Galveston, and every section of this broad land which has been heretofore ravaged or may be liable to be ravaged in the future by this disease? I repeat, it is to be presumed that this committee know more about the matter than the Committee on Appropriations; and I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. BURCHARD. Mr. Speaker, the chief value of the report which is to be made on this subject will not depend upon the opinions of the members of the committee, but upon the facts, scientific or medical, which may be embraced in their report. In my judgment the conclusions of the experts and the facts which they may have collected as in their opinion important will be more valuable to the medical world and more conducive to the object for which this committee is appointed than anything else that may be embraced in the report. Hence I think that the number of experts should be as large as the importance of the subject may warrant. I therefore favor the proposition which has received the sanction of the committee.

Mr. WILSON. I concur in the view of the gentleman from Tennessee to limit this number of experts to seven. If, however, it shall be found necessary in their opinion to an intelligent conclusion of the subjects submitted to their charge, I favor the idea of giving them the discretionary power to increase the number of experts to thirteen. As has been properly said, you should have some regard to the opinion of gentlemen called to investigate this question. They have investigated it, and recommend according to their best opinion that thirteen experts are necessary. With a view of getting before the House the view I express I offer an amendment to the amendment, so as to make it acceptable to every one, by adding the following words:

Unless in the opinion of the joint committee a larger number of experts shall be necessary to intelligent action on the subjects referred to therein, in which event said committee shall be authorized to increase said number of experts, so that such increase shall not exceed thirteen experts in all.

Mr. GOODE. Let me suggest to my friend that the joint committee of the Senate and House have already formed an opinion on that subject, and it is not presumable from anything which has occurred that opinion will be changed. They have already formed an opinion and recommend seven are not sufficient.

Mr. WILSON. I offer that amendment in order to get the views of the gentlemen before the House, so that if seven are not enough and the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee shall prevail I desire to give to the joint commission the discretionary power to increase the number to thirteen.

Mr. YOUNG. It may be proper to say, Mr. Speaker, that matter has been considered by the committee, and they were unanimously of the opinion thirteen should be employed, and they have already signified their purpose to employ that number.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the gentleman if it is not necessary to increase the appropriation if thirteen are employed?

Mr. YOUNG. I think not; we made the calculation on that basis.

Mr. STONE, of Iowa. I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question.

Mr. YOUNG. I will yield to my colleague on the committee with pleasure.

Mr. STONE, of Iowa. I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether it would not be proper to state in his place how they propose to select these experts?

Mr. YOUNG. They are selected so far from every section of the country—North, East, and West.

Mr. STONE, of Iowa. By whom?

Mr. YOUNG. By the committee. They were authorized by the resolutions of the House and Senate to select these experts.

Mr. STONE, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, if it be not considered impertinent on my part, I should like to suggest that in the selection of experts to be employed by the committee reference shall be had to local medical societies in the different cities. These experts should be selected from those societies. I make this suggestion knowing full well that they will be better informed in reference to the qualifications of the men to be selected than any other men possibly can be. For, sir, you not only want expert testimony, but you want expert testimony which the judgment of the House and country may rely upon with perfect confidence. I make the suggestion with the full belief that it is the only way you can get experts to accompany this commission whose testimony will be of any value whatever when this report shall come in.

Mr. YOUNG. The gentleman from Iowa is no doubt correct as to the method which should be taken in the selection of these experts.

So far as the committee has gone already in making the selection, they have consulted the Representatives in Congress from the districts whence they propose to take these gentlemen and all who have been spoken of at all and will be selected by this committee come to us with the highest recommendation for professional acquirements from the Representatives of the districts where they reside. We have in some instances made inquiries of medical men and taken their judgment in reference to the experts we propose to employ. So far as I am concerned, and I believe that will be the action of the whole committee, I shall endeavor to select from the medical profession such men as will be indorsed by the medical faculty of the country.

Mr. WAIT. Mr. Speaker, there will be a very great embarrassment, as gentlemen will see at once, in accepting the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa. From what school of medical men are you to select these experts? One party will cry out you must take them from the homœopathic school, another party that you must take them from the allopathic school, another from the botanic practitioners, and still another that they shall be selected from those who heal in the scriptural manner, by the laying on of hands. Hence it will be seen you bring up at last by getting into a troublesome controversy with the doctors of every medical school that exists in the country. We ought not to adopt any such plan or proceeding unless we want "confusion worse confounded."

Now, sir, there are public bodies in all the cities, boards of health composed of responsible and intelligent men possessed of valuable statistical information, capable of forming an opinion on a subject of vital importance to the entire people of this country and to shed light upon this very important and deeply interesting subject; so, instead of referring this matter to physicians selected from the different medical schools, choosing here and there a man from one school and a man from another, let the matter be referred, if to any particular class or classes, to those who from long experience and their public positions are cognizant of the facts and possessed of information in the different sections of the country which the inquiry demands and who will be able to enlighten the members who are to report to this body for its action on the subject referred to them.

Now, with regard to the number of the commission to be appointed under the resolution, I feel, sir, that the larger you make this number the less attention will be paid to the duties which they are to discharge. I entirely agree with the gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman of the committee, that if you limit the number to seven you fasten the responsibility on that limited number, and they will be intelligent and experienced men, who will be selected with great care and will feel that it is their duty to give the fullest consideration to this matter. They will not feel that the number is so large that they can shift the responsibility from their own hands and shoulders to the hands and shoulders of others. I certainly trust the amendment increasing the number to thirteen will not prevail.

Mr. WILSON. Why not give to the committee the power, after they get into session, to make the number larger than seven if they think it necessary to do so?

Mr. WAIT. I will answer my friend from West Virginia, whose opinion I generally respect very much. The nine gentlemen comprising this committee will be beset by applications from parties all over the country to employ as experts particular friends who will desire to figure as members of the commission. I do not think there is any necessity for it, and I would not open the door for any increase of expenditure when I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. ATKINS. Knowing it to be the opinion of some members of the joint committee that seven experts were sufficient I offered that amendment. But as it has met so much opposition, and the idea being suggested that there will be greater safety in having a greater number, and not feeling any desire to interpose any obstacle at all in the way of the investigation, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. YOUNG. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution (H. R. No. 210) making an appropriation for the purpose of paying the necessary expenses incurred in investigating the origin and causes of epidemic diseases in the United States was read three times, and passed.

Mr. YOUNG moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] has demanded the regular order.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the demand for a moment.

Mr. PAGE. There has been so much pressure brought to bear by gentlemen who desire to be recognized by the Chair that I withdraw the demand for the regular order.

ASSIGNMENT OF LAND SCRIP.

Mr. GUNTER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 109) defining the manner in which certain land scrip may be assigned and located, or applied by actual settlers, and providing for the issue of patents in the name of the locator or his legal representative, be taken from the table for present consideration. I think it will take but a moment.

Mr. WILSON. That bill ought to pass. It is full of merit.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Let it be read.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read for information, after which objections, if any, will be in order.

The bill was read.

Mr. GUNTER. I now ask that the report be read.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to know whether this bill comes from a committee to which it had been referred.

Mr. GUNTER. I will state to the gentleman that this is a Senate bill. It was unanimously reported by the Senate committee. It has also been considered by the Committee on Private Land Claims of the House and has been unanimously reported by that committee.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire respectfully to say that the bill is not such a bill as I think should have gone to the Committee on Private Land Claims. It attaches to the whole public domain of the United States, and it ought to have gone to the Committee on Public Lands. I think the bill ought to go to that committee to be reported back to the House from that committee.

Mr. GUNTER. The main feature of the bill is to permit individuals to utilize scrip in payment of pre-emption claims or in commutation of homestead claims.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. In reply to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] I will say this: I do not consider that this is a bill of a nature which properly brings it before the Public Lands Committee. It is confined solely to private land claims. It was carefully considered in the last session, as well as again during the present session. There is not any difference of opinion among the members of the Committee on Private Land Claims in regard to it. It makes no new grant of land. It simply declares what is the character of the scrip that should be issued.

I will say further that nearly one-third of the lands involved in this bill—certainly more than one-fourth—belongs to a school in Baltimore. These lands, that were granted to that school by one of the parties entitled, form, I believe, fully one-fourth of the land involved in the bill. No injury can result to any person or any interest from its passage. It simply defines the character of the scrip to be issued. I will say further that this question has been adjudicated by the courts, and it has been declared that the scrip shall issue. It is only a question as to the kind of scrip which shall be issued.

Mr. DUNNELL. The more I hear about this bill the more I object to its passage at this time, if it is proper for me to do so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair reserved the right of objection.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If the bill is now sent to the Public Lands Committee, it is effectually defeated; but there is no sane reason for defeating it; there is no justice in defeating it. Justice and right can only be promoted by the passage of this bill. If there were any reason why it should not pass, that reason would have been discovered by the committee which considered it. It has unanimously passed the Senate, and the Committee on Private Land Claims of this House has unanimously asked the gentleman from Arkansas to move that the bill be taken from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage.

Mr. WILSON. Has there been a single dissenting voice as to the merits of this bill in the Senate or in the House committee?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Not one that I am aware of.

Mr. DUNNELL. It is not an unanswerable argument that this bill has unanimously passed the Senate. We have to pass the bill ourselves. As I understand it, scrip which cannot now be located upon the unsettled public lands of the United States may be located or laid upon those public lands. I shall object to the passage of a bill that shall allow this scrip which was not intended for location upon public lands opened for homestead and pre-emption to be now entered upon lands of that description.

Mr. GUNTER. I would state that the gentleman misapprehends the scope of the bill. The bill carefully provides against the objection that he urges. It provides only for the utilizing or using of this scrip in commutation of homestead and pre-emption, and is subject to be used only on land subject to private entry at $1.25 an acre, and hence this objection is not valid.

The SPEAKER. The right to object was reserved. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Minnesota to insist on his objection?

Mr. DUNNELL. I do.

BOARD OF PHYSICIANS AT ERIE, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Whereas charges of a grave character have been filed with the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department against the examining board of physicians at Erie, Pennsylvania, and other officers connected with the Pension Bureau; and

Whereas sufficient information has been brought before said committee to warrant an examination of the same:

Resolved, That the subcommittee having charge of investigation of the Patent and Pension Bureaus be, and they are hereby, authorized to examine the same during the recess, and for that purpose may hold sessions at said city of Erie, and that said subcommittee have power to subpœna witnesses, administer oaths, take testimony, and employ a stenographer, and be attended by a deputy sergeant-at-arms, and that the sum of $300, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be appropriated out of the contingent fund to meet the expenses of said examination.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. I do not think the gentleman would object if he understood it.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I object, without knowing more about it.

FEDERAL OFFICERS AT ELECTIONS.

Mr. ATKINS. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered at this time.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, directed to communicate to this House the total number of supervisors and deputy marshals employed throughout the United States in connection with the elections held on the 8th day of October and the 5th day of November last, stating the number so employed in each State and at each voting precinct respectively, and the length of time they were so employed, with a full statement of the causes and necessity of such employment, what duties they performed, and the amount of compensation paid to them and from what fund or item of the appropriations the same was paid.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not think we had better go into that. We have so many investigations already and all going in one direction.

Mr. FINLEY. It is not an investigation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Ohio to object.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it be printed.

Mr. ATKINS. I will then ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

Mr. O'NEILL. I object.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the regular order.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the Indian appropriation bill; and pending that motion I move that all general debate thereon be limited to two minutes.

The question was taken upon the motion to limit debate; and it was agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole; and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LIGON in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5534) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. All general debate upon this bill is limited to two minutes.

Mr. SPARKS. In submitting the Indian appropriation bill, Mr. Chairman, I merely desire to state that it is substantially the appropriation of the last law. It is within last year's appropriation. There are some changes in some branches of the service where there are reductions and others where there are additions, but it is substantially in all respects the appropriation of last year as to amount and as to the various branches of the service. It is the unanimous report of the Committee on Appropriations and meets the approval of the Indian Office. I believe I am warranted in saying that it meets the approval of the Indian Office, as it is certainly the unanimous report of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ATKINS. Before my colleague takes his seat I desire to call his attention to one feature of the bill in which there is an increase of the appropriation for the police force; perhaps he might desire to make some explanations in relation to that point.

Mr. SPARKS. I incidentally alluded to that. There is an increase in that service. Last year we appropriated $30,600 for an Indian police, and this year the appropriation is increased to $60,000, being an increase of $29,400 in that particular branch of the service. There are other parts of the bill in which there are increases, and some where there are reductions, altogether bringing the bill within and under the appropriations of last year.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed by the House for general debate is exhausted.

Mr. SPARKS. I now ask that the first and formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it now be read by paragraphs for amendment.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill, and read the following:

That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of paying the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, namely:

For pay of seventy-four agents of Indian affairs at the following-named agencies, at the rates respectively indicated, namely:

* * * * * * * *

At the Round Valley agency, at $1,500.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move to amend the last paragraph read by striking out "$1,500" and inserting "$1,000." My reasons for that motion are these: last year there was appropriated for this reservation some $20,000, and nearly $10,000 of it was used for the payment of employés on that reservation. The testimony before the commission which recently visited California shows that these Indians are as well qualified to manage their own business as are the citizens of the country. They are good farmers, good millers, and it is a great outrage to pay these enormous salaries to men who simply stay there and do nothing. I think $1,000 is sufficient. If this amendment is agreed to, at the proper time I will move to strike out the appropriations for other employés, because the Indians there are good farmers and are working in the country far and near and receiving as good wages as other white men.

Mr. SPARKS. The proposition of the gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] is in my direction generally, because it is a reduction of expenditures. Of course I cannot be supposed to know the precise service demanded of this agent. I will state to the Committee of the Whole that the appropriation for the service of that agent is the same that has been given in previous appropriation bills.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I would like to say to the gentleman that the testimony of witnesses who reside in the vicinity, for instance, Hon. George W. Henry, an eminent citizen and a member of the Legislature, (my friend from Mississippi, Mr. HOOKER, was present when the testimony was given,) is to the effect that there are only two hundred and odd Indians at the agency at this time; all the others are off employed on farms.

Mr. SPARKS. I was proceeding to state that the Indian Office estimated for this appropriation. From them I have no information that would lead me to suppose that the pay of this employé of the Government should be reduced.

There are some nine hundred Indians pertaining to this agency, as I can show by reference to a communication from the Indian Office. During the discussion of the Indian appropriation bill last session we made an effort to grade these agencies. Prior to that time they were all fixed at $1,500 per annum each. We then graded them, made some higher and some lower. I am under the impression that it would not be wise to reduce this one; and that is about all I desire to say to the committee on the subject.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. LUTTRELL; and upon a division there were—ayes 18, noes 63.

There being no further count called for, the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following:

At the Los Pinos agency, at $1,600.

Mr. SPARKS. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$1,600" and inserting "$1,500."

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I would ask the gentleman why he proposes to make this change?

Mr. SPARKS. In answer to the gentleman I would state that we are grading the three agencies there. It is the desire of the Indian Office to have the compensation of this agent made $100 less than here given, of the next agent $200 more, and of the other agent $100 less. It makes them amount in the aggregate to the same, and grades them better and pays them more equally, as the Indian Office informs me.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I cannot understand upon what data the Indian Office makes any such discrimination. The truth is that the agent at the Los Pinos agency has more Indians under his charge and has a greater extent of territory to watch than has either of the other two agents. Hence I cannot see why you should strike down the salary of one and add to the salary of another. I know that to be the fact, both from traversing a portion of the country myself, from a personal acquaintance with the agent, and from a general knowledge of the number of Indians at the agency.

Mr. SPARKS. If the gentleman will examine the matter he will see that the agent at the Los Pinos agency gets more than either of the others.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. And he is entitled to more.

Mr. SPARKS. Well, he gets more.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Because he has four times as many Indians under his charge as either of the other two agents. The great bulk of the Ute Indians are at the Los Pinos agency. In my judgment the great responsibility of the Indians in the State of Colorado rests upon the agent at Los Pinos. I hope there will be no diminution in the salary that agent has been receiving.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. The salaries of these three agents, as reported in the text of the bill, are those they have received since the commencement of the present fiscal year. Under the operation of the existing law, and on a survey of the whole question, the Indian department of the Government has reached the conclusion that justice requires the revision and redistribution of the amount of these salaries. The information communicated by that department to the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations is to the effect that changes have recently taken place in reference to the number of Indians and the responsibility of the service, and in order that these agents, for the services rendered, may receive substantially equal compensation, the amendment offered by my colleague on the committee [Mr. SPARKS] should be adopted.

I submit that it will hardly do for the Committee of the Whole to take the judgment of a single member of the House without any official data as its foundation in preference to the deliberate judgment expressed by the department of the Government having this subject-matter in charge. I hope, therefore, that the amendment offered by my colleague on the committee, in pursuance of the recommendation of the Department, may be adopted.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I admit as a general proposition that a judgment expressed by the head of a department should have greater weight ordinarily than the judgment of any single unofficial individual; yet it is possible in many cases that a single individual, on account of the locality from which he comes, may have a better knowledge of a particular subject than the head of a Department. Now, I know as a fact that no changes whatever have taken place in the jurisdiction of the agent at the Los Pinos agency. There are altogether in Colorado 4,000 Ute Indians, of whom at least 3,200 or 3,300 are under the charge of the agent at Los Pinos. His territory has not been cut down; not a single Indian has been taken from his jurisdiction. The truth is, that if the amount of labor to be performed, the judgment, experience, and other qualifications of the Indian agent at Los Pinos as compared with those of other agents are to form any criterion as to the salary to be paid, the agent at Los Pinos should receive twice as much as other agents. I am personally acquainted with this agent; and I know that a more conscientious and deserving man never entered into the Indian service. Because it is within my knowledge that no reason exists for this change, I hope no change will be made in the salary he has been receiving up to the present time. It is a beggarly salary at most. He left a comfortable home to go down to live among those Indians at the Los Pinos agency; and certainly a salary of $1,600 is not too much for a competent person to receive for the services which this agent renders.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOOKER. There is one question I would like to put to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS,] in reference not only to the measure now under consideration but in regard to all these agencies. What is the principle upon which the committee proceed in fixing the rate of compensation at every agency, and at whose instance is it fixed at the rate indicated in the bill?

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, the reorganization of these agencies is a work of much labor; and we fixed the basis on the number of Indians, the locality of the agency, (of course in some localities living is much cheaper than at others,) the character of the Indians, and the amounts of money or supplies to be dispensed by the agents. All of these enter into this arrangement. I will add that I believe the first suggestion of this reorganization of the agents was made by myself to the Indian Office during the last session. According to my recollection the original proposition came from me; and the Indian Office agreed that it was a good suggestion.

Mr. HOOKER. These Indian agents are entitled under the law, as I understand, to $1,500 apiece; and this provision changes that?

Mr. SPARKS. Under the law as made annually in our appropriation acts these agents were all of them paid $1,500 apiece.

Mr. HOOKER. Without reference to the number of Indians under their care?

Mr. SPARKS. At the last session of Congress we graded these agencies so that at a smaller agency a smaller salary should be paid, and at a larger agency a larger salary. The proposition here is simply to reduce the salary of this agent to the extent of $100. It is stated by the Indian Office to be in keeping with fairness—relatively right as to the other agents.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. The gentleman states that in grading these agencies the number of Indians under each agent and other matters of similar character are taken into consideration.

Mr. SPARKS. The number of the Indians is one element.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Does the gentleman know the number of Indians embraced within each of these three agencies? If he does not, I can tell him as a fact that the agent at Los Pinos has four times as many Indians under his control as either of the other two agencies; and these Indians roam over an expanse of territory ten times greater than the territory occupied by the Indians of the other agencies.

Mr. SPARKS. In reply to the gentleman, I will say that while the number of Indians is one element to be taken into consideration, yet in many cases a particular agent is entitled to a greater amount of pay than another agent having under his care three times as many Indians. The amount of salary must be influenced by other circumstances, such as the amounts of money or supplies to be dispensed by the particular agent.

So far as this particular agency is concerned, to be frank, Mr. Chairman, I will state that I know no special reason why it should be reduced, except from the information I get from the Indian Office.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 20; no quorum voting.

Mr. SPARKS. No quorum has voted, and I therefore demand tellers.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I trust that the gentleman from Illinois will not haggle over a quart of peanuts. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPARKS. I trust the gentleman will not delay the action of the committee on so small a sum.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I think the wish of the Department should be carried out, even against the wishes of the constituents of the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Does the gentleman's committee carry out the wishes of the Department in all cases? I think not.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. When the committee are agreed and no reason is suggested why the information of the Department should not be carried out I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SPARKS. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SPARKS, and Mr. PATTERSON of Colorado, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 28.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the White River agency, at $1,200.

Mr. SPARKS. I move to strike out "two," in line 87, and insert "four;" so it will read "$1,400."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the Southern Ute agency, at $1,500.

Mr. SPARKS. I move to strike out "five," in line 89, and insert "four;" so it will read, "$1,400."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the Omaha and Winnebago agency, at $1,600.

Mr. BOONE. In line 93, I move to strike out "six" and insert "four."

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 24.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of seventy-seven interpreters, as follows, namely:

Mr. SPARKS. I move to strike out on page 7, line 137, "seven," and insert "six;" so it will read: "for pay of seventy-six interpreters, as follows, namely."

The object of that amendment, Mr. Chairman, is to correct an error which crept into the bill as it was reported from the Committee on Appropriations. Seventy-seven interpreters cover an agency which has been stricken out. This makes it conform to the arrangement of the agencies.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Five for the tribes in New Mexico, namely, two for the Navajo, and one each for the Mascalero Apache, Pueblo, and Abiquiu agencies, at $300 per annum each, $1,500.

Mr. SPARKS. To make this clause agree with the last amendment adopted in committee I move the following:

In line 165, strike out "five" and insert "four;" in line 166, transpose the word "and" where it occurs the last time to precede the word "Pueblo" in the same line; in line 167, strike out the word "Abiquin;" in line 168, strike out "five" and insert "two;" so it will read:

Four for the tribes in New Mexico, namely, two for the Navajo, and one each for the Mascalero Apache and Pueblo agencies, at $300 per annum each, $1,200.

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional payment of the said interpreters, to be distributed in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, $4,000; in all, $27,100.

Mr. SCALES. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman who reports this bill what is the necessity for the appropriation contained in line 195 to line 198. These interpreters have already been provided for, and I suppose at good salaries. After they have been provided for, then there is another section giving $4,000 additional in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. What extra duties will they have to perform? Why should it not be stricken out?

Mr. SPARKS. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that this is the usual contingent fund appropriated every year, so far back as I have examined.

Mr. SCALES. I should like to ask the gentleman further. Does he know or can he state to the House what these contingencies are? I cannot conceive what contingencies there can be which will require this additional pay. Nothing, surely, to stimulate them to do their duty. The pay already provided is sufficient, it seems to me. Therefore, unless the gentleman can give me more information in regard to it, I will move to strike it out.

Mr. SPARKS. I give the gentleman all the information I can on the subject. Now I can conceive where an Indian interpreter getting $300 per annum for specified services may be required, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to perform additional services and be entitled to receive a few dollars additional. I am informed it has been the custom to pay them an additional sum for extra services, and this provision is intended to cover that extra service. The gentleman perceives it allows, taking the aggregate number of interpreters, something less than $50 to each. An interpreter is confined to his agency, but he may be required to go elsewhere, and $300 a year would not be sufficient to cover his expenses at the agency and also when he is compelled to go elsewhere. Where he performs extra service provision is made for its payment. I think it is eminently just.

Mr. BOONE. In line 137 provision is made for seventy-six interpreters, then going on to name the several interpreters for the different tribes. The paragraph under consideration makes an additional appropriation of $4,000 to those interpreters, and it is placed under the Secretary of the Interior, to be disposed of in his discretion.

I ask the gentleman who has this bill in charge, of the Committee on Appropriations, and who has investigated the subject, and who states it has been the custom to make this allowance, what disposition has been annually made of that $4,000; whether any report has been made upon it; whether in fact it has been paid to these interpreters?

Even if this has been done hitherto, my opinion, humble as it may be, is that this discretionary power in the different Departments of the Government is rather a dangerous thing. It is at least placing at the discretion of one of the heads of Departments money that ought by law to be directed into the channel in which it ought to go. I am opposed, therefore, even if it only amounts to a few dollars to each interpreter, to placing it at the discretion of anybody. If they do not get pay enough let us provide the pay they ought to have; and when they undertake to perform the duties of interpreter for that amount we will know what we are paying for the service and to whom we are paying it. I think the paragraph ought to be stricken out.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I hope this paragragh will not be stricken out. The compensation provided by law for the payment of these interpreters is very small, $300 per annum. In the exigencies of the Indian service it frequently becomes necessary that these interpreters should be taken from the place where they ordinarily perform their duties to other and distant localities. They are oftentimes required to perform additional service. And let me say that in the Forty-fourth Congress the Committee on Appropriations, presided over by I believe the honorable Speaker of this House, and of which Mr. Holman, of Indiana, was a member, appropriated for the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1878, the sum of $6,000 for this purpose, to be expended in the discretion of the Department.

Instead, Mr. Chairman, of the striking out of this discretionary clause for contingent expenses, working in the interest of economy, it would work directly in the opposite direction, for the reason that competent men could not be obtained for $300 a year to perform this service unless they knew they might receive additional compensation for such additional and contingent service as they might be called upon to perform during the year. I hope that the clause will be allowed to stand.

Mr. HOOKER. I think the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina to strike out this clause is a very proper one. In a recent visit which some of the Indian Committee paid to the Indian region of country we found that the functions to be performed by these interpreters were very simple and had only rarely to be exercised. They are simply required, when any council of the nation is held with those who do not understand their language, to be the medium of communication between the Indians and the Government or its committees or others transacting business for it. The specific appropriations in the bill for the interpreters of the various agencies, it seems to me, are ample and sufficient. If any increase is needed it should be made specifically by appropriation, and no such general power should be invested in any officer to make payments increasing the salaries. There can be very few and very rare occasions when it would be necessary to exercise this power, and certainly the amount contemplated to be added is larger than there can be any possible occasion for.

Mr. SPARKS. Without possessing the experience of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] who has been visiting these agencies, I would suppose that the service of an interpreter was quite an important one. These interpreters must communicate with the employés of the agency and communicate to the Indians in the Indian language that which is communicated to them in English by the agents and employés. As it strikes me, there is an immense deal of service to be performed by these interpreters at the agencies, and for this service at the respective agencies they are paid but $300 per annum. Now, it has been a rule of the Department which has been sanctioned by Congress to allow an additional sum in the nature of a contingent fund of $4,000 per annum to be paid for extra services, if you please. I think that that is a very proper thing to be done. An interpreter who gets but $300 per annum is perhaps required to do service elsewhere than at his agency, and as he gets but a very small salary there, in my judgment he ought to be paid something extra for this extra service and it ought to be left discretionary with the Secretary of the Interior whether or not this ought to be done.

Mr. SCALES. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPARKS. If the gentleman will allow me to make one other suggestion I will hear his question in a moment. This sum has been allowed in all of the preceding bills that I have before me, for the year before last, for the last year, for this year. There is no increase. We simply stand on this subject upon preceding law. The gentleman speaks of an increase. That is not the fact and I never knew an objection to be raised upon this point before. I will now hear the gentleman from North Carolina and answer him if I can.

Mr. SCALES. I wanted to ask the gentleman this question: The salaries I believe in this bill of the agents are specifically fixed.

Mr. SPARKS. They always have been.

Mr. SCALES. And yet it very frequently is the case that agents are called here to perform duties. Why does not the gentleman have a discretionary fund in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior to pay them?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for an answer to that question?

Mr. SCALES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. There is a contingent fund of $15,000 provided out of which, in the event of any extra expenses incurred in any such way as the gentleman suggested, if the Indian commissioner thinks it right, the expenses would be paid.

Mr. SCALES. Do I understand the gentleman to say that there is a discretionary fund to increase the pay of the agents?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Not specially for that. I stated that there was a provision in this bill, as there has been in every bill, which places a general contingent fund at the discretion of the Department, to be used as it thinks proper.

Mr. SCALES. My friend from Indiana does not answer my question. I ask my friend from Illinois to do it. The salaries of agents are specified here, and why is there not a contingent discretionary fund set apart for them in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. SPARKS. For whom?

Mr. SCALES. For the agents. There is a specific salary for each interpreter for every tribe, and in addition thereto here is an appropriation of $4,000 set apart for a contingent fund in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior to pay for interpreters.

Mr. SPARKS. I will try to answer the gentleman why we make this extra provision for interpreters. Provision is made for extra agents, as he will discover when we get on further in the bill. I remember making the point in the Indian Office that I did not like this provision for extra agents, but the necessity for it was so clearly explained that I yielded. For instance, an agency becomes vacant and they must have some experienced person to put in it for the time being. Hence, so far as the agencies are concerned, provision is made and discretionary power is left to the Secretary of the Interior to fill them.

As to the interpreters, we make provision for seventy-three, one for each agency; but then there are some extra services which they may be called upon to do, and this provision is for payment for those services.

Mr. SCALES. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of saying one thing more, and then I will not detain the committee any longer. My friend from Illinois says that it has been the custom to make this appropriation for years past. If it is a bad custom we cannot discontinue it too soon; if it is a good custom the gentleman who reports it should be able to show that it is.

It is not sufficient for the House to say that we have done it in times past; the matter should be looked into. Now, is any gentleman prepared to tell the House how the money has been disposed of heretofore? Whether it has all been spent, and if spent, how, or whether there is a surplus?

My friend says it is a small amount. It is a small amount but we want to cut off drops like this, and in a while we might save a bucketfull. I withdraw my formal amendment.

The question was then taken on Mr. SCALES's original amendment; and there were—ayes 14, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS. In order to make the total correspond with the amended items, I move upon page 9, line 197, to strike out "7" and insert "6;" strike out "1" and insert "8;" so as to change the amount to $26,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For buildings at agencies, and repairs of the same, $15,000.

Mr. HOOKER. I move to strike out that clause. It appropriates generally for repairs of Indian agencies without any indication where the agencies are which are to be repaired. It seems to me a character of appropriation that ought not to be made, and I hope it will be stricken out.

Mr. SPARKS. I hardly know how this system could be run without an appropriation of this kind. The sum of $15,000 is proposed to be appropriated here to keep in repair the agency buildings, and if one burns down that another may be built. It is merely to keep the agency buildings in repair, and to renew those that may be destroyed by the casualties of the elements.

Mr. HOOKER. The argument made by the gentleman reporting the bill would seem to imply that this appropriation is a sort of insurance appropriation, but it does not so indicate itself to be. It is simply an appropriation of $15,000 for repairs of agencies, to be expended anywhere and not confined to any particular localities.

The question was taken upon Mr. HOOKER's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I desire to move that the committee rise, and I wish to state to the member of the Committee on Appropriations having the bill in charge my object in making that motion. It is well known that there have been two committees, one of the House and one of the Senate, traveling all over the Indian Territory looking into the Indian question. There are some important amendments which, perhaps, might be suggested to this bill, but those committees have not yet had an opportunity to report, and I hope the gentleman having charge of the bill will let it lie over until after the holidays, so as to give gentlemen who desire to offer amendments an opportunity to do so, or at least give those committees which have investigated the subject an opportunity to report. For that reason, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. SPARKS. I hope the committee will not rise. I do not understand the drive made to prevent the passage of the Indian appropriation bill. I am astonished at it. This bill is put up as all former bills have been put up. It has been put up upon the basis of economy and is within the appropriations of last year. Now, there was no commission appointed to examine into this service. A commission was appointed to consider the question of a transfer of the Indian service from one Department to another Department. That question does not belong to the appropriation bill. Let it come up as an independent proposition. Once, as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I proposed that measure in this House and it passed the House, but it is not germane to appropriation bills, and in my judgment there ought to be no delay in the passage of this bill; there is nothing to warrant it. Why not get through with the bill? Gentlemen certainly feel that this appropriation bill is right in the main. We may have made some mistakes of course, but the bill has been printed for several days and gentlemen who desire to offer amendments could have consulted with me in regard to them at any time. They all knew that I had charge of it.

Now, I do not understand this proposition, unless it is made with a view of bringing into this bill some matter that ought not to be put into an appropriation bill. Let these matters stand upon their own bottoms. Are there claims which gentlemen want to bring in here? I object; let the claims come in as they should come. Is there a transfer question to be brought up? I think it should come from somewhere else, and be considered in the House as an independent proposition.

The Committee on Appropriations is charged with the appropriation of moneys to carry on this branch of the public service. To the best of our ability we have discharged that duty and have reported this bill to the House as the result of our action. I think the House should now go on and complete the consideration of the bill.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. With some slight exceptions I have no objections at all to this bill. It is in the usual form, and I believe in the line of retrenchment, and I shall be glad to help the Committee on Appropriations in that direction. There are one or two important amendments to this bill in the line of retrenchment that I should like to see adopted, and at the proper time I will offer them if some other member does not do so.

But there are questions of vast interest to the country, to the Indian Department, and to the Indians themselves that should have due and fair consideration. There have been committees appointed to investigate this subject. All that I ask is that this bill may lie over until after the holidays, so that the committees may report the result of their investigations and we may be enabled to know how to act. If the transfer proposition is to be considered as an amendment to any bill it may be as proper to offer it to this as to any other. But I do not say that I desire to postpone this bill for that purpose.

Mr. SPARKS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Certainly.

Mr. SPARKS. I would inquire of the gentleman if he is not in favor of early action on the appropriation bills?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Certainly I am.

Mr. SPARKS. It has been the object of the Committee on Appropriations at this short session to put through these appropriation bills as speedily as possible. I would ask if the effect of his motion is not to delay action upon this bill?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. In answer to the gentleman I would say that the public service will not be injured by a postponement of this bill until after the holidays. The appropriations for the Indian service are not exhausted and are not likely to be exhausted during the time which I ask this bill to be postponed.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman favor the House with a statement of the important propositions or amendments which he desires to offer to this bill?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I have frankly stated the object I had in making this motion. It was that the House might have time to consider, and if it was deemed to be proper by those who were disposed to offer important amendments to this bill, give them the opportunity to do so. And it was for the further purpose of having reports from committees that have been traveling all over the country examining into these Indian affairs.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire simply that the gentleman would mention some of these important amendments. If he would do so it might control the action of the House. One other question. Could not the suggestions or propositions which he refers to be put into some other bill, or into a separate bill, where they would be more appropriate perhaps than in this Indian appropriation bill?

Mr. THORCKMORTON. In answer to the gentleman I would say that if this were a long session of Congress it might be possible that the amendments which I desire to offer or which may be proposed by others could be put into a separate bill and be separately considered and acted upon. But as there can be no detriment to the public service or to the Indians themselves by the postponement which I suggest, I cannot see why gentlemen now undertake to hasten this bill through when hardly a member of this body has had time to examine it.

Mr. SCALES. Allow me to interrupt the gentleman a moment.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Certainly.

Mr. SCALES. I would ask the gentleman if there is any probability that this bill can be passed by the Senate before the holidays?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. None whatever.

Mr. SCALES. Then how can there be any delay by postponing it until after the holidays?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. None that I can see.

Mr. SPARKS. I would like to answer my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. SCALES,] the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, by stating that the earlier these bills are passed by the House the earlier they will get into the Senate. One great complaint on the part of the Senate heretofore has been that we never have sent the appropriation bills to them until at the heel of the session. I thought that there was a great deal of point in that.

Now, are not gentlemen mistaken in regard to this bill? Last Saturday I reported it to the House and gave notice that I would call it up on Wednesday, to-day. Is not that timely notice? It is more notice than has been given on any of the other appropriation bills.

There has been no commission appointed to look into this matter of appropriation for the Indian service. The gentleman is simply mistaken about that. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] has amendments to offer to this bill it is his province to offer them. And if the Committee of the Whole feel that they should be incorporated into the bill then they will so act. But in the midst of action upon an appropriation bill the proposition to postpone it until after the holidays is in the direction of delay, as it seems to me, and for nothing else.

Mr. HOOKER. In support of the motion which has been made by my friend from Texas, I beg to say that there are several provisions of this bill to which we intend to offer amendments; and I do not see any reason why the bill should be hurried through this House, inasmuch as its immediate passage is not required by the interests of the public service or by considerations of justice to the Indians. If the immediate adoption of these appropriations were necessary in order that the Government might carry out its treaty stipulations in the payment of annuities to the Indians, I should favor no delay; but there is no special necessity for urging the bill at the present time.

It will be found, by referring to the conclusion of the bill, that it proposes to appropriate something like $4,700,000; and surely, however well the provisions of the bill may have been considered by the committee whose duty it is to submit these bills to the House, it is apparent that many members have not had opportunity to investigate all these provisions. As one member, I am sure I have not done so; and I have heard other members say the same thing. Inasmuch, therefore, as the bill cannot possibly pass the Senate before the holidays, and as we have already passed at the present session a great number of appropriation bills—more than have usually gone through at so early a stage in the session—I do not see any necessity for urging the passage of this bill at the present time.

If we are to inaugurate a system of economy in the administration of Indian affairs we can only do so by departing from the line of precedents referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] and correcting these appropriations which are generally not specific in their character. I do not believe that Congress ought ever to appropriate a single dollar without indicating specifically where it is to go. I am in favor of taking from the heads of the Departments and bureaus this extraordinary discretionary power which it has been the policy of the Government in past appropriation bills to confer upon them. I believe in indicating the legislative will as to where appropriations should go. When a bill proposing so large an appropriation as this is presented, no matter whether it refers to the Indian service or any other, the specific object to which the money is to be applied ought to be discussed and well considered by the House before making the proposed appropriations.

In view of the fact that by the 1st of January we shall have the report of the joint committee of the two Houses upon the subject of the transfer of the Indian Bureau from the Department which now has control of it to another, and as the question will thus be presented upon that report whether the management of Indian affairs should be transferred or should remain where it is, it seems to me no harm can ensue from the postponement of the further consideration of this bill until after the holidays.

Mr. SPARKS. I believe this subject is not debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. THROCKMORTON, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 22, noes 76.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House joint resolution and bill of the following titles:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 206) providing for the distribution of the Revised Statutes of the United States to the Post-Office Department; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5532) authorizing the donation of twenty condemned bronze cannon to aid in the erection of a monument to the memory of General George A. Custer at the Military Academy at West Point.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mixed Shoshones, Bannocks, and Sheepeaters:

For such goods, provisions, and other articles as the President may, from time to time, determine, in instructing in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, in providing employés, educating children, procuring medicine and medical attendance, care for and support of the aged, sick, and infirm, for the helpless orphans of said Indians, and in any other respect to promote their civilization, comfort, and improvement, $25,000.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. The statute of 1802 provides that Indians who leave their reservation and destroy the property of white citizens shall be held responsible and that the President may retain from any annuity or fund intended for such Indians such sum as may be sufficient for the payment of the damages they have done. Now, I desire to ask whether I shall be permitted to offer to this bill an amendment providing that the money appropriated for the benefit of the Bannocks and the Nez Percés, who have destroyed the property of our white citizens, shall be retained to meet the claims of those citizens for the loss of property thus destroyed?

Mr. SPARKS. Has the gentleman made any motion?

Mr. LUTTRELL. I have made a parliamentary inquiry; but I will make a motion.

Mr. SPARKS. What is your motion?

Mr. LUTTRELL. My motion is to amend by adding a provision that no part of this appropriation for the use of the Bannock Indians shall be paid to them until all claims of citizens for the destruction of property by those Indians shall have been adjudicated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. LUTTRELL, (after a pause.) I do not wish to delay the committee, but I give notice that I will offer an amendment of this kind at the end of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Osages:

For interest on $69,120, at 5 per cent. per annum, being value of fifty-four sections of land set apart by treaty of June 2, 1825, for educational purposes, per Senate resolution of January 9, 1838, $3,456.

For interest on $300,000, at 5 per cent. per annum, to be paid semi-annually, in money or such articles as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, as per first article of treaty of September 29, 1865, $15,000; in all, $18,456.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to offer an amendment in the same terms as one that was offered at the last session by my colleague on the Committee on Indian Affairs, the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. STEWART,] whom I do not now see in his seat. This matter was considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs and favorably passed upon. It has for its object the payment of a certain amount agreed by the council of the Osages to be due from that nation, and which they agreed should be deducted from the interest annually payable upon their annuity. I send up the amendment to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 728 insert the following:

Provided, That the proper officers of the Government are hereby authorized and directed to pay the expenses incident to the execution of the trust agreed upon by the treaty of 1865, as set forth in the petition of the Osage Indians to the President in May, 1877; and said payment shall be charged against the interest-bearing credit of said Indians on the books of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. SPARKS. I make the point of order on that amendment. It would evidently change existing law and does not reduce expenditure.

Mr. HOOKER. On that point of order I desire to be heard.

It will be remembered, Mr. Chairman, by those of the House who were present at the last session of Congress when a similar proposition was introduced, that some discussion arose on the subject as to whether or not this amendment was in contravention of the rules—that it was not in the line of economy, and not in accordance with existing law. This same amendment was offered at that time. I took the position then that this was a provision existing under treaty stipulation, referring to the second and sixteenth sections of the treaty with these Indians on that subject.

The sixteenth section of the treaty made the following provision:

It is also agreed by said contracting parties that if said Indians should agree to remove from the State of Kansas and settle on lands to be provided for them by the United States in the Indian Territory on such terms as may be agreed on between the United States and the Indian tribes now residing in said Territory, or any of them, then the diminished reservation shall be disposed of by the United States in the same manner and for the same purposes as hereinbefore provided in relation to said trust lands, except that 50 per cent. of the proceeds of the sale of said diminished reserve may be used by the United States in the purchase of lands for a suitable home for said Indians in said Indian Territory.

Reference was also made to the second section.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. HOOKER. I am speaking to the point of order and nothing else.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. The gentleman's remarks seem to be very remote from it.

Mr. HOOKER. That is the opinion of the gentleman and will go for what it is worth. But I will proceed. I take the position, Mr. Chairman, that so far from this provision which I propose to append to the bill in the shape of the amendment offered being in violation of existing law, it is simply carrying out existing law. I believe, on reflection, the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky who occupied the position of chairman of the committee at that time will say himself that this point of order was not well taken—I mean the gentleman who occupied the chair when the point of order was made by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] last year. I believe on reflection he will say the point of order was not well taken, but on the contrary, the amendment is germane to the subject-matter of the bill and is not in violation of existing law, but pertains to it. I find the following in reference to the motion which was then made, and I refer to the RECORD of last session:

Mr. STEWART. I move to amend by inserting the following:

To defray the expenses incurred by the Osage Nation of Indians in the final sale of their lands in the State of Kansas the proper accounting and executive officers of the United States are hereby authorized and directed to carry into effect the resolution of the national council of the Osage Indians, passed and approved on the 26th day of June, 1873, by the payment out of the proceeds of the sales of the Osage lands in Kansas, now in the custody of the United States, of so much as remains unpaid of the debt of said Indians, as fixed and acknowledged by said resolution.

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point of order that this is new legislation and does not retrench expenditures.

Mr. HOOKER. Upon that point of order I desire to say a word.

Mr. ATKINS. I think, besides, that this amendment is merely a provision of a bill already pending in the House, and is not out of order for that reason.

Mr. HOOKER. Even if it be true that there is no legislation on this subject, there is a treaty stipulation with the tribes to which the amendment refers, and a treaty stands upon the footing of the very highest law that can be enacted by this Government. Hence the point that there is no existing law authorizing this amendment is not well taken. By the stipulation of a treaty and by the action of the council of Osages it has been agreed that this amount is due, and it is proper it should be appropriated, not from the general funds in the Treasury, but from the annual stipend which is paid by the Government under the stipulation of the treaty with those tribes. The objection that there is no law for the appropriation might be made with as much reason against any appropriation to carry out the stipulation of a treaty of the United States. I submit that this point of order is not well taken.

Mr. EDEN. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. HOOKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDEN. Does the gentleman claim this resolution passed by those Osage Indians is part of the law of the United States?

Mr. HOOKER. I say that the treaty stipulations which were to go into effect at the time when they should by their council declare they gave their assent to them, and these stipulations do from that moment of their assent become a portion of the laws of the United States.

Mr. EDEN. The treaty stipulations do not provide for that, but merely the resolution of the Osage Indians.

Mr. HOOKER. The stipulation does provide for it in the sixteenth and second sections. It required the assent of the Osages to make it the law. There is no dispute they have assented to it, and therefore there can be no doubt but what it is a part of the law, and the very highest law of the land, and which ought to be enforced. It is proper this payment should be made because the assent given by these Indians made it a part of the solemn treaty itself. It is common for treaties to stipulate they shall not go into effect until they shall receive the assent of the Indians to be made in some form. We passed such a law in reference to the Southern Utes of Colorado, in which it was stipulated certain portions of their territory should be taken, and they were to give their assent to it by proceedings in council to be signified at the ensuing session of Congress, and then Congress was to ratify it, when it should become the law. If the Osages have complied with this part of the treaty, and agreed to it, then it becomes part of the law of the land, and the amendment I have offered therefore is germane to the pending matter and is not in opposition to the existing law.

Mr. SCALES. Mr. Chairman, one moment on the point of order. I regret to have to differ from my friend from Mississippi. A knowledge of this transaction will show the point of order ought to be sustained. It seems to me the point aimed at is so covered up in the amendment, I will not say intentionally, that perhaps there are not ten men in the House who understand what is meant by it.

When the Osage Indians by treaty ceded their lands to the Government they afterward became dissatisfied, and it is alleged they employed counsel for the purpose of having the whole thing rescinded. A contract was then made by which the counsel employed were to receive one-half of all that was gained by the Indians by a recession of the treaty over and above what was given them by the Government. The treaty was withdrawn and the Indians gained thereby about twelve or fourteen millions of dollars. One-half would have been from six to seven millions. It was thought that six or seven millions for a counsel fee would be regarded as excessive, and they therefore agreed with the Indians in council the amount should be reduced first to $300,000 and afterward to $230,000. That was a contract made contrary to law. It was in violation of an express statute which said that the Indians should not make any such contract except under the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Then the contract stands not only without law, but absolutely in violation of law. That being so, when an amendment is introduced here for the purpose of paying that which could not otherwise be paid and which has no standing under the existing law, then it changes the existing law and must be out of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina a question before he takes his seat. It is whether this claim has not been already paid, or such amount of it as the Secretary of the Interior saw fit should be paid?

Mr. SCALES. It was submitted to the Secretary of the Interior, and he paid $50,000 and decided that this was ample consideration for the services performed and refused to pay another dollar.

Mr. GUNTER. I wish to ask the gentleman from North Carolina one question. Was not the service for the payment of which this amendment is offered rendered before the passage of the law to which he refers prohibiting the payment of any claim except under the advice or direction of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. SCALES. That may be so as to the original agreement. I do not distinctly remember how that was; but the resolution under which they now claim I know is subsequent to the law, and it is therefore certain that the Indians had no authority to bind themselves by it. If the gentleman will look at the report made by the subcommittee, who favored this transaction, as well as the written application made by claimants, he will find that the counsel do not claim it under the original contract. They say it is for services performed and that the Indians have passed a resolution in council that it shall be paid. This resolution was passed since the law to which I referred, and is worth nothing without the approval of the Secretary. The contract is therefore worth nothing. There is no law authorizing the payment of this claim, and to make one of course changes existing law.

Mr. GUNTER. My recollection is this in regard to it: that this contract was made by these parties with the Indians before there was any law prohibiting them from making contracts. Not only that, but that the services that are charged for and recommended to be paid by the Osage Indians were absolutely rendered before the law to which the gentleman has referred was passed.

Mr. EDEN. Was there ever any law under which these Indians had any right to make a contract with counsel?

Mr. SPARKS. There never was.

Mr. EDEN. If there never was any law authorizing it the contract would be of no value.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi to be this, (the gentleman will correct me if I am mistaken:) He proposes to add to this appropriation bill "a provision for the payment of a claim that some parties hold against this tribe of Indians." He may cover it perhaps in the language of the amendment as "the carrying out of a treaty," but in reality the substance of his proposition is the payment of an unadjusted claim. Whether it be just or unjust I know not. This claim, as I am advised, has been brought before the Committee on Indian Affairs frequently, and the chairman of that committee, who has just addressed the House, is well aware of it. The question is and has always been before that committee whether or not it is a just claim and ought to be paid. There is certainly no law now existing authorizing its payment, and to add it to this appropriation bill would be doing that for which there is no warrant or authority of law; and I object to its being brought here in that way. The proper place for it, in my judgment, is the Committee of Claims; or at all events some committee of this House other than the Committee on Appropriations should have charge of it. Then if the committee before which it is brought find it to be just, let a bill be prepared, introduced, and passed through Congress ordering its payment. If this should be done it would then be competent for us to put it on the appropriation bill, but not otherwise under the rule.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the gentleman how much is involved in this claim and what was the character of the service rendered?

Mr. PAGE. The amount is $180,000.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman is correct; the amount is $180,000.

Mr. SCALES. The amount was $230,000 in all, including what has been paid.

Mr. ATKINS. And what was the character of the service rendered?

Mr. SPARKS. Some arrangement had been made by this tribe of Indians by which their lands were to be ceded to a railroad company by the stipulations of a treaty entered into with them by the Government. That treaty had been transmitted by the President to the Senate for ratification. These claimants, being attorneys at law, very correctly advised the tribe that they were getting entirely too little for their lands and entered into an agreement with them to prevent the consummation of that arrangement, which was easily done by getting the President to withdraw the treaty from the Senate. The attorneys then assisted in getting these lands into the market for the benefit of the tribe. This was done by a new treaty with the Government, which was duly ratified and by which many millions of dollars were saved to the Indians. Therefore, as the result of the intelligent action of these gentlemen, they perhaps prevented the consummation of a great fraud upon this tribe of Indians, and afterward assisted them in the consummation of a treaty with the Government by which they saved a good deal of money. All this was as I understand it fairly and well done. They afterward made a settlement with the Indians by the terms of which they were to be paid $230,000 for their services in the premises, of which it seems $50,000 were paid. The Secretary of the Interior, in passing upon the matter, ruled that the tribe had no power to make such agreement, insisted that the tribe had been overreached by the attorneys, sanctioned the $50,000 payment, but refused to allow the remaining $180,000; and it is for this balance of $180,000 that these gentlemen are now besieging Congress. And it is this that the gentleman from Mississippi proposes here to tack on to this appropriation bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the Secretary of the Interior, in the exercise of his authority under the Revised Statutes, did not think the $50,000 was ample payment?

Mr. SPARKS. Yes; and not only ample, but I think he insisted that it was entirely too much. But as it had already been paid, he approved it. It is, Mr. Chairman, at all events simply a claim against this tribe of Indians on the part of two attorneys. It is a matter that ought to be adjudicated in a proper way. If there was a law warranting the appropriation, of course the Committee on Appropriations would meet it, but there is none. It is an unsettled, unadjudicated claim, the parties claiming $180,000 and the Interior Department denying their right to it, and that is all there is of it.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to say one word in corroboration of the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois who has just taken his seat. As a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I have had occasion to look into this matter considerably. It has been discussed for the last four years before the Committee on Indian Affairs. The status of the claim is something like what the gentleman from Illinois has stated. Fifty thousand dollars of the $230,000 claimed by these gentlemen have been paid, and the Secretary of the Interior has refused to pay any more.

The Attorney-General, to whom the whole matter was referred, has decided that the $50,000 before paid was in settlement of the whole claim that these attorneys had against the Osage Indians. I regard it, therefore, as a settled claim, and that any amendment of this nature to this Indian appropriation bill would be new legislation and not in the interest of economy.

When the bill for the payment of this claim shall be properly reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, I shall take pleasure in stating to the House what I believe to be an outrage which is attempted to be committed upon this Indian tribe, by extorting from them $180,000, when these gentlemen, in my judgment, are not entitled to a single dollar of it. I hope, therefore, that the Chairman of the committee will rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I have the honor of holding a place on the Committeee on Indian Affairs, and as a member of that committee I have had occasion to look into this question, and it illustrates that high sense of honor and right that frequently characterizes the legislation of this country.

This Indian tribe was under treaty with the Government of the United States, and their lands were put into the hands of the United States, and the United States thus having their lands in their hands proposed to grant them all away to certain railroad companies, all under this high sense of honor that prevents fraud and jobs. The Indians were helpless, and in that condition they employed two lawyers, one of whom is more than half Indian, Colonel Adair, to come to Washington and if possible prevent the consummation of the outrage that would have robbed them of from six to ten million dollars, and they entered into an agreement with these men at a time when there was no law preventing their entering into such an agreement. This tribe through their council entered into an agreement with Van and Adair to give them half of all they could save out of the wreck that would occur from the action of the United States Government. They came here and hung about the National Congress for two years and finally succeeded in saving to the nation millions and millions of dollars. Had the contract been carried out it would have given to Van and Adair instead of $230,000 millions of dollars.

Mr. SPARKS. How did they save it?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. They did it by coming here and looking after the matter. They beat the treaty and defeated the action of the two Houses.

Mr. SPARKS. How did they beat the treaty?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. They did it by such services as any man has got to do about the lobbies. No legislation affecting money can be carried through the National Congress where private interests are concerned without the necessary labor of intelligent men. It cannot be done.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him in his statement?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Allow me to go through and make my statement. It was felt by Van and Adair themselves that the amount to which they would be entitled under the contract was more than they ought to take from the tribe. The amount saved was much larger than was expected, and finally a new council of the Indians was called in which the whole matter was considered, and their claim, instead of being fixed at several millions of dollars was reduced to $230,000, and when this claim was presented to the Interior Department without rhyme and without reason the Secretary of the Interior said that he would pay them but $50,000.

I have no hesitation in saying, as I believe, I was discharging my duty in agreeing with the majority of the Committee on Indian Affairs to a report in favor of paying these men the amount which it was contracted they should receive, and I say now that having acted in regard to that matter as I believed it was my duty to do I am not to have my views stigmatized as favoring jobs. It was my honest judgment, and if I erred, I erred as I felt I had a right to err as an honest man.

Mr. HAZELTON. Why should the Government pay them?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. It is not the Government that is to pay it: it is to be paid out of the money of the Indians, and the Indians themselves ask that it shall be paid.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. If this wrong was done by the Government why should the Indians be obliged to pay it? Why should it not be paid out of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. The Indians do not ask the United States to pay it, and the United States stand here of their own accord refusing to allow the Indians to pay it.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. The Indians certainly ought not to pay for a wrong which was done by the National Government.

Mr. SPARKS. I have listened attentively to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] and he has very clearly stated this matter except in this respect: all that these attorneys had to do originally was to go to the President of the United States and ask him to withdraw that treaty from the Senate, and that is all they did. I wanted to say that much in regard to this matter at the time the gentleman was speaking.

This is certainly a claim. I am told that it is now pending before the Committee on Indian Affairs, where it ought to pend. If it is proper to be allowed, then they will report a bill in favor of allowing it and it can be passed and become a law, and thus a basis established for its payment. It certainly should not be tacked on to this appropriation bill. The point of order must therefore, in my judgment, be held to be good against it.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him as to the status of this matter?

Mr. SPARKS. Oh, yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. It is not pending before the Committee on Indian Affairs; it is pending before this House upon a report of the majority of that committee.

Mr. SPARKS. I am informed that it is still pending before the committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. SPARKS. It is ordered to be reported to the House, but the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] informs me that it has not yet been reported.

Mr. PAGE. The bill has passed the committee, but it has not to my knowledge been reported to this House. Our committee has not been called since then.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I understood that Mr. GUNTER had reported it.

Mr. PAGE. Not yet. One word in answer to the gentleman from New York. If these attorneys were entitled to get pay for any purpose it was for preventing the President of the United States and the Senate of the United States from taking undue advantage of these Indians.

Mr. SCALES. Allow me one moment. I ask the gentleman if this whole thing was not prevented simply by the President withdrawing the treaty from the Senate?

Mr. PAGE. That is so.

Mr. SPARKS. This discussion is not pertinent to the question before the committee, and I insist upon the point of order being decided.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear a little further discussion.

Mr. GUNTER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] states that at the time of the original contract between these attorneys and the Indians there was no law authorizing such a contract. I will state that the Indians were themselves free agents to act for themselves in all contracts similar to this. In other words, there was no law existing at the time prohibiting the Indians from making such a contract as they made with these attorneys.

Again, it is alleged that there was no service rendered here by these attorneys further than to come here and make an appeal to the President to withdraw the treaty.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I rise to a point of order. Debate is not in order after a decision has been rendered by the Chair.

Mr. GUNTER. Just one word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will allow a brief debate.

Mr. GUNTER. These attorneys were engaged in this matter for more than two years, and they took pains to go backward and forward to the Indian nation for the purpose of taking depositions and proof showing that there had been a fraud practiced upon these Indians.

Mr. SPARKS. This debate is certainly not directed to the point of order, but is proceeding upon the merits of the claim.

The CHAIRMAN. The merits of the question are not to be discussed upon the point of order.

Mr. HOOKER. A single word upon the point of order. There is no sort of question but what a treaty existed between these Indians and the Government out of which this claim grew. There is no sort of question but what the action was had as stated by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND.] Had this claim been presented according to the original contract, according to the admissions of the Osage Indians themselves, these parties would have been entitled to $5,000,000 as their compensation under the contract.

Now, what did these parties do? They came forward voluntarily and said to the Indians: according to the agreement between us we would get more money than we choose to take. We agree of our own accord to vacate that contract, and will agree that your council shall determine what we shall receive. The council of the Indians admitted that the attorneys had saved for them by their action $10,000,000; that the attorneys had given back to them their contract for pay, and had agreed that they should be paid a much less sum. Now, if this claim grew up under a treaty it certainly cannot be said that there is no law under which this amendment can be offered.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I had understood the Chair to announce his decision upon the question of order some time ago.

The CHAIRMAN. That is an error, caused perhaps by the confusion which existed here.

Mr. HOOKER. On the point of order I desire further to state, as I stated before, that the resolution—I now read from the Journal of the last session of Congress, when this same measure was up and this same point of order was made—the resolution of the Osage council recognized the claim proposed to be paid by this amendment. I would call the attention of the Chair especially to a provision of the treaty.

Under the treaty this fund was to be paid into the Treasury of the United States, to be credited to the account of the Osages, and if they recognized in council, as I understand they have done by resolution, the propriety of this claim, it cannot be said that there is no existing law authorizing this provision.

Mr. SPARKS. Now I hope we shall have a decision on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair is satisfied that the point of order is well taken. In the first place it is well taken because the amendment does not show upon its face that it is in the line of retrenchment. It is well taken, in the opinion of the Chair, upon the additional ground that it contravenes the forty-eighth rule of the House, which provides that—

> No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment. No bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith any other bill or resolution pending before the House.

Without giving any other reasons the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read as follows, under the head "Sacs and Foxes of the Mississippi:"

> For interest on $800,000, at 5 per cent., per second article of treaty of October 11, 1842, $40,000: Provided, That the sum of $1,500 of this amount shall be used for the pay of a physician and for purchase of medicine; in all, $51,000.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. I offer the following amendment, to which I think the gentleman in charge of the bill will have no objection:

> Insert after the paragraph just read the following:
> And provided, That of the sum appropriated there be expended $1,000 for the support of the school and of a farmer for the Sacs and Foxes of the Mississippi at the agency in Iowa.

It will be observed that this amendment does not propose to increase the amount of the appropriation at all; it simply distributes a portion of it. The same amendment was inserted on my suggestion in the bill on this subject passed at the last session.

Mr. SPARKS. If I understand the amendment correctly, I have no objection to it whatever.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. The same amendment has been continued in the appropriation bills from year to year. It merely provides how a part of the money belonging to these Indians shall be spent for their benefit.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I see that a provision in the same terms is in the bill passed at the last session.

Mr. SPARKS. The amendment is identical with a provision in the bill of last session, and I have no objection to it whatever.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. I hope it will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Winnebagoes:
> For interest on $804,909.17, at 5 per cent. per annum, per fourth article of treaty of November 1, 1837, and joint resolution of July 17, 1862, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to expend said interest for the support, education, and civilization of said Indians, $40,245.45.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to ask the gentleman having charge of the bill whether the clause just read with reference to the Winnebago Indians was inserted in accordance with statements presented to the committee by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Secretary of the Interior, or whether it is based upon the provisions of the treaty.

Mr. SPARKS. In answer to the gentleman I will say that as I understand, this provision is warranted by the treaty; that the Secretary of the Interior has the power to expend this interest in this way.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that by the treaties with the Winnebagoes there was originally a fund the principal of which amounted to over a million of dollars. By an act of Congress of 1872 or 1873, appropriating about $200,000 of this principal for the purpose of erecting residences for the Winnebagoes upon their reservation in the State of Nebraska, the principal of the fund was reduced to something over $900,000, as appears from a statement made by the Department a few days ago.

The paragraph of the bill now under consideration proposes to give a very large discretion to the Secretary of the Interior with reference to the disposition of this fund. It was stated by my colleague on the committee [Mr. BOONE] a few moments ago, when advocating a proposition to reduce the salary of these agents that the Winnebagoes needed none. Now, sir, the interest upon the fund of the Winnebagoes amounts to something like $45,000 per annum. These Indians are very largely self-sustaining, as has been testified before the Committee on Indian Affairs. They are large producers of the necessaries of life. We found when visiting them during the last summer that according to the testimony of their agent and their chiefs they had not received any per capita of the funds due to them by the Government for three years, and that the whole amount of the accrued interest at 5 per cent. per annum upon the capital of their fund was absolutely expended in the maintenance of the agricultural interests of the agency and of the schools. A school building has been erected at a cost of some $20,000, and over a hundred houses have also been erected and paid for out of the principal of their money, at the rate of $696 for each house.

Now, I insist that this large discretion should not be given to the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. We made inquiry how this money was paid to these Indians and we found that within the last three years it has been used solely for the purpose of maintaining their schools, paying the employés of the agency, and furnishing the Indians with agricultural implements of the modern standard. These Indians are but fourteen hundred in number. They ought to be the wealthiest population of that number on the continent of America, if there were an honest and proper appropriation of this fund for their benefit. I mean to say that they ought to have this money in such a form as would add to their material prosperity. They have upon the agency a full-blooded Indian as engineer conducting their business; they have also a full-blooded Indian at the head of their shoe establishment as well as their blacksmith establishment. They are to a very large extent self-sustaining. So far from this fund being appropriated in the manner which the bill proposes, it ought to be paid to these Indians, or to their authorized agents or chiefs, to be appropriated by them as they might deem proper.

I move, therefore, to amend by striking out that portion of the pending paragraph which proposes to give a discretion to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Secretary of the Interior with reference to this matter, and by providing that this interest shall be paid to the authorized chiefs (of whom I believe there are twelve, elected by the tribe) to be receipted for by them.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, the argument of my friend from Mississippi is against what is known as the "peace policy" or civil management of Indian affairs, that is so far as this tribe is concerned. These Indians have, through their treaties with the Government, obtained a fund of nearly $900,000, upon which the Government is by treaty bound to pay 5 per cent. per annum interest. These treaties and this joint resolution alluded to in the bill give the power to control this fund on behalf of the Indians in the way indicated in the bill. The question is submitted to this committee whether or not the Government of the United States shall take charge of this fund and use it for the education and civilization of this tribe of Indians or give it to them and let them play "Big Indian" for themselves. That is about what it is. If we dispense with this system of management of Indians, who is to civilize, and Christianize, and educate them? If we dispense with that and treat with the Indians as with equals and give them what is due to them from the Government of the United States in money, then I would agree with the gentleman. But so long as the Government conceives it to be its duty to hold in trust the funds of these Indians and apply the interest arising from them for their education, civilization, and enlightenment according to the lawfully established policy inaugurated many years ago we should appropriate funds to sustain it. And we cannot do so by tacking on amendments like this in any case, for the same policy prevails here that prevails in all the agencies. The Government simply uses this money due to these Indians, it is to be supposed, wisely and honestly for their interest. If it has been dishonestly used it is the fault of the Government officials. I have read a great deal of the bad management of that department. In times past I am convinced that charge was correct, but my conviction now is that an effort is being made to do better.

Sir, a question arises, is it wise to pursue this guardian "peace policy?" And then the question of transfer comes up. Now, sir, I do not discuss nor pass upon these questions, but so long as it is left to the Interior Department to manage Indian affairs under the policy now lawfully established we should live up to it and use this fund under some wise management and not pay it over, and, if you please, allow the Indians to throw it away.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I find, sir, this treaty with these Indians was made over forty years ago. If we are to judge of the future by the past, then when will the Commissioner of Indian Affairs under his management bring these Indians up to a standard where they will be able to take care of their own affairs? More than forty years have elapsed, and yet he comes in here and says these Indians are not fit to take care of their own funds, but must have them expended through the rings and combinations which results only in robbing the Indians. I think it is high time we ought to put a stop to it. I believe the gentleman from Mississippi is right in his proposition, and I shall therefore vote for it.

From my knowledge of Indian affairs, and I have resided on the frontier for more than thirty years, I have never yet known this policy to result in any advantage to the Indian. What we want is that whenever the Indians are qualified to receive their funds they shall be allowed to do so.

A commission recently visited these Indians and its members speak knowingly on the subject. They tell you these Indians are qualified to manage their own affairs.

I know from the management of this man Hayt he knows no more about Indian affairs than a hog does about a holiday. [Laughter.] If he had taken the advice of my friend the Delegate from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] and other gentlemen upon this floor, we would have had no Indian war. I told him unless he pursued a different course the blood of hundreds of people would be upon his head. In less than sixty days my prophecy came true. The Indians broke out into war, which if he had taken the advice of the Members and Delegates who represent the Indian country upon this floor would have been prevented. He knows nothing about the subject. He tells you that General Crook and General Sheridan know nothing about it. I want to see the whole system changed. I wish to see Indian affairs managed by such men as Sherman, Sheridan, and Crook, so we may get rid of the infernal scoundrels who have been plundering the Indians and forcing them to commit depredations upon the frontier settlers.

Mr. SPARKS. Is not that speech an argument in favor of the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department, and not pertinent to the subject now before us?

Mr. LUTTRELL. Yes; and I should like to have the gentleman answer it if he can. After forty years, when we are told that these Indians are able to take care of their own affairs, I should like to know why they should not be permitted to spend their own funds in their own way?

Mr. SPARKS. This treaty with the Indians makes provision for the use of the fund precisely as is proposed in this bill, and as has been done year after year. I have the treaty and joint resolution before me making provision for the use of this fund, and now send the joint resolution to the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized to expend from the fund in the Treasury of the United States belonging to the Winnebago Indians the sum of $50,000 or so much thereof as may be necessary, to make such improvements on their land and purchase such stock and agricultural implements as their interests may require; and that the amount so expended shall be replaced from the proceeds of the sales of the lands belonging to said Indians which the Government is now authorized to sell by virtue of the existing treaty with said Indians.

Mr. HOOKER. What is the date of that treaty?

Mr. SPARKS. July 17, 1862.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I have had also the pleasure of living upon the Indian frontier and in the Indian country, and I have this to say, that I never knew a man who made his living by robbing and plundering the Indians in that country who was not bitterly opposed to any system of supervision of the Indians which rested in the hands of responsible parties at the central seat of authority. They are always desirous of having large sums of money disbursed directly to the Indians in order that that class of men may make profit by the plunder of those unable to protect themselves.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I ask the gentleman to what class of men he refers?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I refer to a class of men altogether too numerous on the frontier who are bringing the Indians into conflict with the national authority and shedding innocent blood——

Mr. LUTTRELL. Your contractors.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. In order that they may put into their pockets the money that belongs to these Indians. Now I undertake to say there is not an honest man on the frontier who will not recognize the fact that it is infinitely better that these Indians should have purchased for them at the great centers of business in this country the articles necessary for their comfort and support, and that they should be distributed to them directly by the Indian Office, than that this money should be doled directly to the Indians to be plundered from them by the hungry hordes that hang around every Indian reservation. And I want to say this, that the gentleman from California may entertain the opinion of the officer he has referred to, and which he has expressed in such elegant and classic language, that he knows no more about his business than a hog does about holiday——

Mr. LUTTRELL. I believe it.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I know there are gentlemen, equally competent with the gentleman from California to form an opinion, who have an entirely different opinion on that subject. It is a matter of taste. If he sees fit in such coarse and vulgar terms as that to assail a gentleman who cannot defend himself, he has all the honor and glory to be derived from such a proceeding.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this appropriation is made in accordance with the treaties and the law. It is for the interest of the Indians, and I undertake to say there is nobody will regret to see this bill stand as it comes from the committee except those who expect to get the forty or fifty thousand dollars in the event of its being paid to these Indians in cash.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move to strike out the last word. When the gentleman from Indiana speaks of the dishonest motives of frontiersmen, I hurl the imputation back to him; and I will give him some illustrations of the way in which the Indians are robbed on the frontiers by rings of contractors. In one reservation in my district the agent purchased five hundred head of cattle for $8 a head and turned round and sold forty head to the Government for the same figure, and made as net profits the value of the four hundred and sixty head. In another instance, $5,000 was appropriated in the Forty-third Congress to build a hospital in Round Valley reservation; I made the motion myself; yet no hospital has ever been built.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. If such frauds have been committed, why do you not prosecute such men?

Mr. LUTTRELL. Under your republican administration we have been prevented from doing so. And not only that, but if you go to the Klamath reservation you will find that your political tricksters have taken Indian blankets worth $2.50 a pair and cutting them into three or four pieces have charged the Government with three or four pairs. Deny that if you dare. The proof is here. And yet you talk to us of our robbing the Indian. What occurred in Eastern Oregon? A man who went on a reservation with a cart-load of vegetables had them taken from him; he left the reservation to rob the frontiersmen. Why? Because your agent and the ring had robbed him.

The gentleman from Indiana talks about vulgar language. These things call for language more forcible than elegant, and I can only make men like the gentleman from Indiana understand it by speaking plain English. Go and ask Senator SAUNDERS, and ask the gentleman from Montana, [Mr. MAGINNIS,] and they will tell you that had this man followed our instructions and our advice we would have had no Indian troubles.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to say a word or two.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HOOKER. Then I move to strike out the last word.

A joint resolution has been sent to the desk by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS,] who had it read for the purpose of explaining the treaty with the Winnebagoes. I desire to say that the treaty under which this fund originally existed was the treaty of 1838. The Indians were careful in the making of this treaty to give the discretionary power to use this money to the authorities of the United States only to a limited extent. I make no charge, Mr. Chairman, against the agent at this agency; I simply say that it is unwise to pay the whole amount of interest which is annually due to these Indians by the Government in simply an expenditure for school purposes and agricultural implements; and that I understand is the way in which it has been expended for the last three years. The provisions of the treaty of 1838 to which I referred are as follows:

Fifth. To deliver to them provisions to the amount of $10,000, and horses to the same amount.

Ninth. To invest the balance of the proceeds of the lands ceded in the first article of this treaty, amounting to $1,100,000, and to guarantee to them an interest of not less than 5 per cent.

Of this interest, amounting to $55,000, it is agreed the following disposition shall be made:

For purposes of education, $2,800.

For the support of an interpreter for the school, $500.

For the support of a miller, $600.

For the supply of agricultural implements and assistance, $500.

For medical services and medicines, $600.

The foregoing sums to be expended for the objects specified for the term of twenty-two years, and longer at the discretion of the President. If at the expiration of that period, or any time thereafter, he shall think it expedient to discontinue either or all of the above allowances, the amount so discontinued shall be paid to said Winnebago Nation. The residne of the interest, amounting to $50,000, shall be paid to said nation in the following manner: $10,000 in provisions, $20,000 in goods, and $20,000 in money.

I say, then, that it is not in the interest of the Indians that the amount coming to them should be expended for agricultural implements alone at the discretion of the officers of the United States Government.

It is contended by their agent that they are now self-sustaining; and if it be true that they have native Indians in many of the places formerly filled by white men, then I say they have advanced sufficiently to be allowed to take care of their own affairs to the extent at least of having the annuities paid in money and not in goods, at the discretion of officers of the Government.

I was startled when I discovered by the evidence of the chiefs of the tribe, and of the agent himself, that out of the whole of this money not a dollar ever reached the pocket of a single Winnebago. It was all expended for the purchase of agricultural implements.

I withdraw my formal amendment and offer in lieu of it the following:

Strike out all the words after "sixty-two," in line 1160, and insert:

And said sum shall be paid to an agent duly authorized by said tribe to receive the same; and the same shall be divided and paid to heads of families, or per capita, as said tribe shall in council determine.

The question was upon Mr. HOOKER'S amendment.

Mr. FINLEY. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, only 16 members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and on a division there were ayes 43, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LIGON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 5534) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled the bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 5532) authorizing the donation of twenty condemned bronze cannon to aid in the erection of a monument to the memory of General George A. Custer, at the Military Academy at West Point; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 206) providing for the distribution of the Revised Statutes of the United States to the Post-Office Department.

Mr. RAINEY, from the same committee, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 5535) changing the time of holding the terms of the United States circuit court for the district of West Virginia.

GEORGE W. CRAWFORD.

Mr. FORNEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5687) authorizing the President to appoint George W. Crawford, of Alabama, a second lieutenant in the Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. BOONE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) to extend the time within which the Joint Committee on Indian Affairs may report; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BOONE. I ask for the present consideration of that joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that the time in which the joint committee appointed by the Senate and House of Representatives to consider the transfer of the management of Indian affairs from the Interior to the War Department may report be extended to the 1st day of February, 1879.

There was no objection; and the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BOONE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. WOOD. I ask unanimous consent that Wednesday, the 15th of January, be set apart for the consideration of reports from the Committee of Ways and Means of a public nature.

Mr. MILLS. What bill?

Mr. WOOD. Any bills we may have to report, or that have been reported.

Mr. BANNING. There are other committees who have reports to make, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that this is in the interest of public legislation.

Mr. WOOD. The bills are of great importance, and they should be acted on early.

Mr. HALE. What is the proposition?

The SPEAKER. That the 15th day of January, after the reading of the Journal, be devoted, so far as may be required, to the consideration of reports from the Committee of Ways and Means of a public character.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. To report them only?

The SPEAKER. For consideration.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. What are the bills?

Mr. WOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that there is no tariff bill.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the gentleman from New York reporting any more tariff bills.

Mr. WOOD. We do not propose to report anything but necessary legislation.

The SPEAKER. That is a conditional objection on the part of the gentleman from Michigan, and is not good.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. WOOD moved to reconsider the order just made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF THE MEXICAN WAR.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 257) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican and other wars therein named, and that it be made a special order for January 9.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say to the gentleman that January the 9th has been fixed for the consideration of the Army bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Then I will say Tuesday next after that.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. There is a special order for that day already.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Then I will say the following Thursday, which will be the 16th.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I desire, then, to give notice that on Thursday, the 9th day of January next, I shall move to go into Committee of the Whole to take up that bill, and I propose to do it every time that I can get the floor until it is considered.

J. M. MICOW.

A portion of these reports have ordinarily been given to the Interior Department, and that Department has been in the habit of sending them to libraries in the States. As there is a mistake of one date in the printed form of House bill No. 5046, in relation to counting the electoral votes, and as there are several amendments in the phraseology which have been agreed upon by the committee, I ask consent that the bill which the committee may agree to report to the House on this subject be printed.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

POSTAL-CAR DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I rise to a question of privilege which concerns the action of the House yesterday. I find in the New York papers of to-day a statement that the postal-car deficiency bill, which was passed by this House last evening, restricts the service to what it was on the 1st day of December, 1877; and thereupon there are many comments as to the injury which will be done to the public by this restriction. I call attention to the fact that the date named in the restrictive clause was the 1st day of December, 1878.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. WINDOM, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. WITHERS as the conferees on the part of the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 5312) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Quartermaster-General containing a petition from Superintendent James Burke, praying for the passage of an act to reimburse him for the costs of a suit entered against him by W. H. Logan for alleged trespass; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 11th instant, a report of the Chief of Ordnance upon the subject of the issues of arms, &c., for use under the direction of the Department of the Interior, the Department of the Treasury, and the Department of Justice since January 1, 1872; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from John I. Davenport, clerk of the circuit court for the southern district of New York, transmitting, in obedience to an order of that court, a presentment of the grand jury made at a recent term of the court on account of frauds in issuing election certificates to aliens not entitled thereto in 1868, and suggesting certain amendments to the naturalization laws; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Public Printer, submitting his annual report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present the petition of Henry S. King, formerly second sergeant Company B, Second Regiment Missouri Mounted Riflemen, serving under Colonel Pierce in Mexico, praying for a pension. His age is seventy-two. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Pensions, and trust that the committee will give it early consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY presented the petition of Lansford P. Yandell and wife, and others, citizens of Kentucky, and Norman Farrell and wife, and others, citizens of Tennessee, praying the passage of a law relieving the bondsmen for H. L. Norvell, late collector of United States revenue for the second district of Tennessee, from liability; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WITHERS. I have here the petition of 1,047 farmers of Lonisa County, Virginia, praying for the repeal of the tobacco tax. I will state that this petition is the action of the farmers of that county, and corroborates a statement which I have had the honor heretofore to make, that the producing interests in that line are vitally interested in the prompt and immediate settlement of the question. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, presented a petition of citizens of Florida, praying an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Saint John's River in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the petition of Seth Driggs, praying to be remunerated for losses sustained by the captain of the American ship Good Return on the high seas, and referring to memorials heretofore presented. I think this petition probably goes properly to the Committee on the Judiciary, as it relates to a matter before that committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of William M. Young, of Elizabethtown, New York, and the petition of Abial Hathaway, of Schuyler Falls, New York, praying for the passage of the bill of the House of Representatives providing that all pensions shall commence at the date of the discharge or death of the soldiers for whom they are granted; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. INGALLS. I present certain evidence in support of the claim of S. D. Houston, late receiver and disbursing agent of public moneys at the United States land office at Junction City, Kansas, praying to be reimbursed for money lost by the use of a defective Government safe. Bacon, late lieutenant of the First Regiment Dakota Cavalry Volunteers, praying that he may be credited with the sum of $5,950 in the settlement of his accounts with the United States as assistant quartermaster in the Northwest Indian expedition in 1864; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3855) for the relief of William A. Mann, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John S. Cunningham, a pay director in the Navy, praying to be reimbursed for the amount of certain funds alleged to have been misapplied by a clerk in his office at San Francisco, California, in March, 1878, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1543) for the relief of John S. Cunningham. The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DORSEY. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5682) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for transportation of mails by railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, to report it without amendment. I ask that it be placed on the Calendar, and I give notice that at a later hour in the day I shall call it up and ask for its consideration.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I inquire of the Senator who reports that bill, as it is necessary to have it immediately go into effect, why he does not ask for its consideration now? There will be no objection to it.

Mr. DORSEY. Since the Committee on Appropriations adjourned I have been informed that Senators from some of the New England States have been telegraphed to that this bill will remove the postal cars from the railroads in their States. I think it is an error, but we have telegraphed the Post-Office Department to ascertain if any postal cars in New England would have to be taken off under this bill, and I am waiting now for an answer. As soon as that comes I will call up the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I submit to the Senator that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who ought to know of everything connected with the postal service, and also the special agent in charge of that service were before the committee this morning, and nothing of that kind appears to be the result. However, if the Senator wishes a delay, of course I will not object. He has charge of the bill.

Mr. DORSEY. I fully concur in what the Senator from West Virginia has said, and I believe with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General that this bill will not affect in any way the present postal-car system except to prevent any additional postal-car service being put on. But the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads has some information on the subject, and he requests that I let the bill lie on the table for an hour or two.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have received a dispatch from the postmaster at Providence saying that the bill as reported cuts off the postal car from New York to Providence, the morning car.

Mr. DORSEY. I am quite sure the postmaster is in error in that respect. Unless the car has been put on since the 1st of December this bill cannot cut it off. If it has been put on since then it is a new service.

Mr. ANTHONY. It was put on before then. It has been on for years.

Mr. DORSEY. It has been on for years and this will not affect it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie on the table subject to the call of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The Committee on the Revision of the Laws, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1505) to repeal sections 820 and 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute and recommend the passage of the substitute. The substitute is entitled "A bill to repeal section 820, Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to jurors in criminal cases."

Mr. CONKLING. Is it printed?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. It is not printed.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I ask that it be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be printed under the rule.

Mr. BECK. I desire to give notice that to-morrow at the close of the morning hour I shall endeavor to call up the bill just reported by the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and shall ask the Senate to take action upon it at that time.

TERRITORIAL SURVEYS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives to print 10,000 copies of Professor Hayden's twelfth annual report of the Geological and Geographical Survey of the Territories for 1878, have instructed me to report it back without amendment and to ask its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives to print 3,000 copies each of volumes 3, 8, and 13 of the final reports of the Geological and Geographical Surveys in quarto form, with the necessary illustrations, have instructed me to report it with amendments and to recommend its passage as amended. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 3,000 copies each of volumes 3, 8, and 13 of the final reports of the Geological and Geographical Survey of the Territories in quarto form, with the necessary illustrations; 1,500 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 for the use of the Senate, 500 for the use of the survey, and 500 for the use of the Department of the Interior; the illustrations to be made by the Public Printer, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

The resolution was reported from the Committee on Printing, with amendments, so as to make it read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 3,000 copies each of volumes 3, 8, and 13 of the final reports of the Geological and Geographical Survey of the Territories in quarto form, with the necessary illustrations; 1,500 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 750 for the use of the Senate, 375 for the use of the survey, and 375 for the use of the Department of the Interior, the illustrations to be made by the Public Printer, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was concurred in.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury which states that under the restrictions—if it was not disrespectful I would say the absurd restrictions—put upon the Government Printing Office in the appropriation bill of the last session he is unable to bind these digests which are necessary to be distributed to the disbursing officers and executive officers of the Treasury, and therefore this resolution is necessary.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McDONALD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1544) to reimburse the several States for interest paid on war loans, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORRILL (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1545) to correct an appointment in the pay department of the Army of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1546) to establish certain post-routes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1547) making an appropriation to improve the Little Kanawha River, in the State of West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BURNSIDE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1548) for the relief of Herman Biggs; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WITHERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1549) granting a pension to Mrs. Matilda M. McCreery; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition and papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1550) for the relief of Cyrus K. Lord; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. COKE, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw the petition and accompanying papers in the case of Videl Hernandez, of Texas.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5218) to establish post-roads in the several States herein named; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF COOS BAY, OREGON.

Mr. MITCHELL. Some three or four days ago the honorable Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] gave notice that this morning after the morning hour he proposed to submit some remarks on the bill for the reorganization of the Army. I, on the 9th of December, introduced a bill authorizing an appropriation to improve the entrance to Coos Bay, Oregon, which was laid on the table, and I stated at the time that I would call it up at a subsequent day and submit some remarks upon it, which I think I can do before the morning hour expires. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1452) making an appropriation to improve the entrance to Coos Bay and harbor, Oregon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Has the bill come from a committee?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not.

Mr. MITCHELL. It has not. It was introduced by myself, and at my instance laid upon the table until I should submit some remarks before asking a reference. I shall be very brief.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator only wishes to submit remarks upon the bill, I have no objection to its consideration.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates $100,000 for the improvement of Coos Bay Harbor and the entrance thereto, in accordance with the plan of the engineer department.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the pending bill proposes an appropriation of $100,000 toward the improvement of the entrance to Coos Bay and harbor, on the coast of Oregon, and it is my purpose, briefly as I can, to attract the attention of the Senate to the general characteristics of this port, the amount and value of its commerce, and the importance in a national as well as local sense of the proposed improvement.

Coos Bay is situated a short distance north of Cape Arago, on the Pacific coast, in latitude about forty-three and one-half degrees north, and so far from being an obscure port, without commerce and unfrequented by ships, it has been for years and is to-day second in importance in the value and extent of its imports and first in shipbuilding on the Oregon coast, annually visited by hundreds of vessels, and annually exporting many hundreds of thousands of dollars in value of lumber, coal, masts, ship-knees, staves, pickets, laths, broom-handles, match-wood, hides, fruit, fish, &c., while ship-building is now carried on here as a regular business and in an extensive manner. From the report of a committee appointed by a meeting of the citizens of Coos Bay and vicinity, held at Marshfield, Oregon, August 17, 1878, and which was composed of citizens of integrity and high character and whose statements are entitled to full confidence, I glean the following facts and statistics bearing upon this subject:

Statement of the value of exports from Coos Bay each year for the past six years.

Year.	Value of coal and lumber exported.	Value of other exports.	Total value.
1871	$367,697 50	$17,517 50	$385,214 00
1872	315,167 75	22,640 00	337,870 75
1873	385,230 00	21,179 00	406,409 00
1874	351,137 00	19,253 00	370,390 00
1875	379,110 00	23,751 00	403,861 00
1876	471,116 50	24,070 00	495,867 00
1877	445,270 00	23,000 00	468,170 00
1878, for eight months	208,389 00	16,000 00	224,389 00
Total	2,924,108 75	167,410 50	3,192,161 75

Again, it may seem a surprise to Senators who have given no attention to this important center of commerce on the Pacific coast, and who may perhaps have regarded Coos Bay as a place of commerce merely in name, to be assured on unquestionable authority that during the past eight years an average of nearly two hundred ocean vessels have arrived at and departed from this port annually. To be entirely accurate as well as specific, the arrivals and departures have been as follows:

Number and carrying capacity of vessels arriving and clearing at Coos Bay for the past eight years.

Year.	No. of vessels.	Carrying capacity.
1871	180	63,200
1872	161	56,350
1873	190	76,000
1874	171	68,400
1875	186	74,400
1876	204	91,800
1877	189	89,100
1878, for eight months	107	46,300
Total	1,388	565,550

The resources of this portion of Oregon, whose natural outlet to the sea is through the port of Coos Bay, and I may say necessarily so from its geographical location, are even at this early day of immense importance, and when fully developed, as they very soon would be were the entrance to this harbor properly improved, would be almost incalculable. Contiguous and conveniently accessible to this harbor are the most extensive and finest coal mines west of the Rocky Mountains, while almost boundless forests of fir, pine, cedar, maple, and ash, among the most magnificent and valuable for lumber and ship-building on the continent, are within easy transport to its waters. It is stated in the report to which I have called attention that within an area of ten miles of Coos Bay there are not less than seventy-five thousand acres of good coal land which will produce from the strata generally worked four hundred and fifty million tons of coal. This is an estimate, moreover, of but one seam or vein, while in many parts of this vast coal field there are as many as six workable veins. It is further stated that the area of lands known to contain coal but not fully prospected lying in the vicinity of Coos Bay contains not less than two hundred and fifty thousand acres. Some of these veins are as much as eleven feet in thickness. There are now five extensive coal mines opened on Coos Bay, and capable of producing nearly two thousand tons of coal daily. To-day hundreds of thousands of tons of coal are being imported annually into the Pacific States and Territories from Australia and British America, while with the proper improvement of the entrance of this harbor we could cut off importations and supply our wants from our own mines; and if indeed not quite this, at all events we could compete successfully with any other country and add millions to our material wealth.

LUMBER TRADE.

The timber in the vicinity of Coos Bay is unsurpassed in quality by any of the forests of this continent, and in quantity extending to and including densly-covered hundreds of thousands of acres, yielding, as they do, from 100,000 to 200,000 feet to the acre of the best quality of lumber, which finds a ready market in the Sandwich Islands, South America, Australia, Japan, China, as well as in San Francisco and other California ports. There are now in operation on Coos Bay four large steam saw mills, which aggregate a capacity of about 115,000 feet per day, or if run to their full capacity, 141,975,000 feet per annum. To say, therefore, that the lumber interests of Coos Bay would, in the event of the reasonable improvement of the harbor so as to permit the entrance of ships of larger draught constitute a worthy rival in this important branch of commerce to the world-renowned lumber ports of Puget Sound, would be no exaggeration.

COOS BAY AS A SHIP-BUILDING PORT.

Again, this port has acquired at this early day an enviable reputation for ship-building. It has been demonstrated that vessels can be built cheaper here than can vessels of the same size and capacity in the ship-yards of the Atlantic seaboard. This results in a great measure from the inexhaustible quantities of all kinds of the very best ship-building timber standing at the very door of the ship-yards. Over forty vessels in all, ranging from 50 to 2,000 tons burden, and aggregating a capacity of 16,350 tons, have been constructed at the four ship-yards of North Bend, Marshfield, Empire City, and Coos River of this ship-building port. Indeed, the largest merchant-vessel—the ship Western Shore, 2,000 tons burden—ever built on the Pacific coast was built and successfully launched from the North Bend ship-yard, on Coos Bay. All vessels built here are, for all purposes of insurance or otherwise, rated as A 1, and, as said by the committee in their report:

> It is safe to assert that there are no better vessels of their class afloat than those which compose the fleet of schooners now plying in the coal and lumber business in this bay, the best of which were built here. Some of these vessels are over twenty years old, and are still doing good service and apparently as sound as ever.

I submit the following table, which I take from the report to which I have directed attention, which gives the name and capacity of the different vessels built on Coos Bay:

I have said enough, I apprehend, to demonstrate the vast importance of this port in respect of its coal, lumbering, and ship-building interests, all of which have been developed to the extent to which they have without any aid whatever from the National Government. While Congress in the years that have passed has with a lavish hand appropriated hundreds of thousands of dollars annually for the improvement of streams that are not entitled to be dignified with any other or greater names than "Trout Creek" or "Mistletoe Run," and which are without present commerce or the slightest hope of it in the future, this and ports of like and some of them of greater and others of less importance, such as Port Orford, Yaquima, Foulweather, Alsea, Tillamook, and others on the Pacific coast have been left to struggle into merited importance single-handed, unaided, and alone.

But what is the improvement demanded and what the estimate of its cost; and will the end in a national point of view justify the means required? The great difficulty in reference to this matter is not so much in the harbor as in the entrance to the harbor. Vessels of 13 feet draught can enter and depart with cargoes in safety except at certain perilous times of stormy seas. Such vessels, however, cannot compete in the matter of freights with vessels of larger draught engaged in the coal and lumbering trade of Puget Sound and British America. Congress at its last session, in view of the commercial importance of Coos Bay, inserted in the river and harbor bill a clause authorizing a survey and estimate for the improvement to the entrance of this port. That survey and estimate have been made under the direction of Major John M. Wilson, of the United States Engineer Corps. His report was submitted to the Chief of Engineers on the 23d of September last, and in pursuance of a resolution of the Senate passed at the present session was laid before us by the Secretary of War on the 17th of the present month, ordered printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

This report, careful, complete, painstaking as it is, shows conclusively not only the imperative necessity of the proposed improvement but its entire feasibility likewise, and I ask to have it appended to my remarks.

That this improvement should be inaugurated at once there can be no room for doubt; that it would, when completed, add annually hundreds of thousands of dollars and at no distant day millions to the nation's wealth in a commercial sense, there can be no doubt. No principle, therefore, of false economy; no "penny-wise and pound-foolish" policy, I trust, will stand in the way of doing this act of justice to our nation's commerce, as well also to a most worthy and enterprising pioneer people on our western frontiers, while at the same time by the very act the nation will in the end reap an abundant recompense in the development of its natural resources and the extension of its commerce. Trusting, therefore, that the Committee on Commerce may at the proper time give to this subject their earnest consideration and favorable action, thus for the future vindicating the well-earned character of that committee for just discrimination and prompt, judicious, and intelligent legislative action, I shall occupy the attention of the Senate no longer at present. I move the reference of the pending bill to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

The report referred to in the preceding remarks is as follows:

SURVEY OF ENTRANCE TO COOS BAY, OREGON.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE.
Portland, Oregon, September 30, 1878.

GENERAL: I have the honor to transmit herewith a chart of the entrance to Coos Bay, Oregon, together with the report of Mr. C. M. Bolton, assistant engineer, and to submit the following report of a survey made under my direction in August, 1878, in accordance with the act of Congress approved June 18, 1878.

OBJECT OF THE SURVEY.

The law of June 18, 1878, required a survey of "the entrance to Coos Bay" and an estimate of the cost of improvements "proper to be made."

COOS BAY.

Coos Bay empties into the Pacific Ocean about 2½ miles east northeast of Cape Arago; on the north side of the mouth the ground is low and sandy with shifting sand-dunes, and on the south side it is high and bold.

The bay is completely landlocked, presenting a fine harbor after getting inside. From its entrance it extends in a northeasterly direction a distance of about 7 miles to North Bend, with an average width of ½ a mile and a channel of not less than 22 feet depth at low water, with the exception of one bar about ¼ of a mile long, upon which there is a depth of 15 feet.

At North Bend another bar extends across the bay with a depth of 11 feet at low water, although by careful sounding a narrow intricate channel of 22 feet has been found.

From North Bend the bay extends in a southerly direction to Marshfield, a distance of about 5 miles, with a depth of about 16 feet at low water.

Coal Bank Slough, which enters the bay at Marshfield, carries a depth of 10 feet at low water to the Newport and Eastport Mining Companies' landings, about 2 miles from the bay. Isthmus Slough has a depth of about 20 feet at low water for a distance of about 6 miles.

THE ENTRANCE TO COOS BAY.

The great difficulty at the entrance to Coos Bay arises from the shifting character of the sand and the peculiarities of the tides. During the summer the heavy northwest winds, sweeping down the coast, drive the sand thrown up on the shore by the currents along the north spit, emptying it into the bay and into the channel at its entrance, thus prolonging the spit. The movement of this spit is said to be very regular, the channel breaking through to the north of its present position about once in five years; soon after the new channel opens, the north sands again commence to move southerly, the ebb-tide not being strong enough, for reasons hereafter to be given, to carry them off; this continues, the spit lengthening until it occupies about the position now indicated on the chart, forcing the channel close under Coos Head on the south side; while this is in progress the sand-bar outside of Coos Head and north of "Lone Rock" makes northerly, caused by the fact that Cape Arago, jutting out abruptly about 2 miles to the westward, prevents to a great extent the escape of the drift sand, and the convergence of the shore-line between the mouth of Umpqua and the entrance to Coos Bay (the main shore-line running nearly north and south, while that of Cape Arago runs nearly east and west) concentrates the force of the northwest seas into this pocket; moreover, as the channel inside of the north spit makes down and the current strikes Coos Head, it is forced to the northward along the western side of the spit.

When this condition of affairs is reached the water again breaks through the north spit to the north of its present exit, and presents for a short time a good and straight channel out to deep water.

The condition of affairs to-day is ripe for the opening of a new channel. The line of deepest water has been forced down toward Coos Head; the spit has worked down; the outer sand-bar has grown toward the north; there is a depth of only about 9 feet at low water on the outer bar, although 14 feet can be carried up along the west face of the north sand spit and thence to deep water beyond.

TIDES AND CURRENTS.

The mean rise and fall of tides is 5.1 feet, of spring-tides 6.8, and of neap-tides 3.7 feet.

I remarked in the description of the entrance to Coos Bay that the ebb-tide was not sufficiently strong to prevent the growth of the north spit.

An examination of the chart will show that after crossing the bar, entering, the waters divide, forming Coos Bay proper to the north and the south slough to the south. It has been observed that the incoming tide runs up the south slough nearly an hour before it commences to ascend the bay proper, and that the ebb-tide runs out from the slough about the same length of time before it begins to run from the bay; we therefore find the apparent anomaly of a flooding and ebbing tide in the same body of water; moreover, as the ebb comes down the bay proper it meets that coming down the slough, the two running in opposite directions causing an eddy and greatly diminishing the velocity and scouring force at the entrance, where it is so necessary in order to carry out the sands coming down the coast from the north.

PROPOSED IMPROVEMENT.

In any improvement of the entrance to this bay three objects must be kept in view: first, the tidal flow in the bay proper must not be decreased, but must be made as great as possible; second, the flow of the ebb from the bay must be so directed as to prevent it from meeting directly that coming from the south slough; and, third, steps must be taken if possible to prevent the drift sands from moving down the north sand-spit into the channel.

To overcome the difficulties arising from the meeting of the ebb-tides it is proposed to run a training-wall, starting from the east side of the bay about 1½ miles from Coos Head, and carrying it across the spit out to deep water near the line through which the channel is generally cut; parallel to it and at a distance about equal to the present width of the entrance will be another wall, and it is hoped and expected that the increase of velocity gained by the ebb-tide passing between these walls will be sufficient to keep a good channel open out to deep water.

To prevent the sand coming down the spit, it is thought that several strong fences across it at certain intervals will answer present purposes, these fences to be removed as soon as the sand reaches their tops.

The tops of the training-walls should be built to a height of at least 3 feet above low water in order to gain the scouring force due to the ebb-tide; the outer ends should be carried up to high-water mark, and upon them should be placed a cement-masonry superstructure about 15 feet high and 20 feet square. The lower wall should have a harbor-light at the outer end. The walls should be built entirely of stone, as the "teredo" and "limnoria" rapidly destroy wood-work of any character used in constructing wharves, &c., in the bay.

Within the limits of the bay they could be built of ordinary rubble-stone, the sides and top to be of large pieces from one to four tons in weight; where the violent action of the sea is felt outside the immediate limits of the bay, they could be constructed of ordinary rubble to a height of 10 feet below low water, and of rubble in pieces from 5 to 20 tons from that height to the top, the sides to be well protected by blocks of the same size. It is possible that the upper wall may not be required. Of course it would be highly advantageous to use mattresses of twigs in these constructions were it possible, but as there is no fresh water, they would be rapidly destroyed.

The estimated cost of the work, in order to obtain a channel with a depth of 22 feet at low water, is approximately as follows:

Southern training-wall, 8,000 feet long, at $70	$560,000
Northern training-wall, 5,000 feet long, at $70	350,000
Two masonry abutments, at $8,000 each	16,000
Contingencies, 5 per cent	46,000
Total	972,000

It is possible that the northern training-wall will not be required, in which case the estimated cost of the work would be about $600,000.

It is proposed to so regulate the direction of these walls that vessels seeking shelter from southwest gales, which are the severest and most dangerous on the coast, can enter without coming broadside to the wind, as is now necessary in navigating the present entrance; this would place the walls nearly at right angles to the northwest seas, and prevent the silting up from sand driven along by them. Stone for the construction of this work can be obtained near at hand in Coos Bay.

COMMERCIAL STATISTICS.

I transmit herewith a statement of the statistics of Coos Bay, prepared by a committee of citizens.

The export value of lumber, coal, and other products from January 1, 1871, to August 31, 1878, was $3,192,161.75; during the same period 1,388 vessels, with a carrying capacity of 565,550 tons, entered and cleared. The ship-building interest is second to none on the coast; 40 vessels, including the Western Shore, a ship of 2,000 tons capacity, have been built in the bay. Fourteen saw-mills are in operation, with an aggregate capacity of about 115,000 feet, board measure, per day.

There are 5 coal-mines already opened on the bay, with a total capacity of about 1,800 tons daily.

Two steam-tugs are employed towing on the bar, and four small steamers carry passengers and freight on the bay and its tributaries.

Coos Bay is in the collection district of Southern Oregon. Empire City on the bay is a port of entry.

There were no foreign imports, and consequently no revenue collected therefrom, during the last fiscal year.

Only one vessel cleared for a foreign port during the year; her cargo was 160,000 feet of lumber, valued at $16,000.

The number of coasting vessels entering and clearing during the year 1877 was 189, with a carrying capacity of 89,100 tons.

The estimated value of the coal, lumber, and other exports shipped from the bay in 1877 was $468,170. The nearest light-house is at Cape Arago; the nearest works of defense are at the mouth of the Columbia River, about 180 miles distant.

The report of Mr. C. M. Bolton, assistant engineer, and a copy of the statistics of Coos Bay are transmitted herewith. In making this survey and that of Coquille River Mr. Bolton was subjected to numerous minor difficulties, and he deserves credit for the faithful and energetic manner in which he has performed the duties assigned to him.

The sum of $200,000 can be profitably expended upon this work during the next fiscal year.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN M. WILSON,
Major Engineers, Brevet Colonel, United States Army.

Brigadier-General A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

REPORT OF MR. CHANNING M. BOLTON, ASSISTANT ENGINEER.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Portland, Oregon, September 23, 1878.

COLONEL: In compliance with instructions from you I started from Portland on the 10th day of August for Coos Bay to make a survey of its entrance. On arrival at Empire City, August 13, I at once proceeded to organize a party and make the necessary examinations. From the amount of money allotted for this purpose and the limited time allowed a thorough survey of the bay could not be made. The field-work was therefore confined to the entrance of the bay, extending only about one mile inland, but by the courtesy of Messrs. Merchant, Bailey, and others I am enabled to give the following additional data: The bay extends from its entrance in a northeasterly direction a distance of about 7 miles to North Bend, with an average width of one-half a mile, with a channel depth to that point of not less than 22 feet at low water, with the exception of a short sand-bar, "Lone Tree," of one-fourth of a mile in length, with a depth of about 15 feet. At North Bend another sand-bar extends nearly across the bay from the northwest side, giving a depth of 11 feet at low water, with a very narrow and crooked channel-way of 22 feet depth. From North Bend the bay extends in a southwardly direction to Mansfield or mouth of Coal Bank Slough, a distance of about 5 miles, and has a depth of about 16 feet at low water. Coal Bank Slough carries 10 feet depth of water at low water to Newport and Eastport Coal Mining Company's landings, about 2 miles from the bay. Isthmus Slough has a depth of about 20 feet at low water from its mouth to Utter City and Henryville, a distance of about 6 miles. Coos River and Hayes Slough are navigable for river steamers, the former about 7 miles the latter 4 miles from the bay. The resources of the country tributary will be seen by reference to paper forwarded herewith, "Statistics of Coos Bay," compiled and published by a committee of the citizens of Coos County.

By the courtesy of Mr. Merchant, the tug-boat Escort, Captain Magee, was placed at my disposal without charge, enabling me to get very good lines of soundings at small cost. I visited the Eastport coal mines and found them of great extent and in good working order. The stratification of the coal is such that it is worked very economically, having a natural drainage and requiring no propping.

The chief difficulty at the entrance of the bay seems to be the shifting sands and crooked channel, the tidal flow not being regulated so as to get the full scouring force of the currents in suitable directions. During ebb-tide the water from the bay and that from South Slough, flowing in opposite directions, meet near the entrance of the bay, causing an eddy where the most scouring effect is needed. A peculiar feature of this tidal flow is that the incoming tide runs up South Slough nearly an hour before it begins to flow up the bay proper. The ebbing tide also runs out from South Slough about the same length of time before the bay appears to be affected, apparently making the anomaly of a flooding and ebbing tide in one body of water at the same time.

I was informed by Mr. Merchant, Captain Magee, Coos Bay pilot, and others, that the movements of the sand-bars have been very regular in their changes. The channel, when best for navigation, lies near the line of the proposed training-wall. The northern sand-spit then begins to form in a southwardly direction, making gradually until it gets to about the position it now occupies, forcing the channel close on to Coos Heads, just opposite. While this is taking place, the sand-bar north of "Lone Rock" makes northwardly, forcing the channel at that point toward the western side of northern sand-spit. When in about the position the channel now occupies, the water breaks over the northern sand-spit, and again forms a new channel on the site of the first. This, I am informed, has occurred three times in the past fifteen years, making each entire change in about five years.

To obviate these difficulties a training-wall, as shown on the chart, is proposed which will regulate the flow to and from the bay, at the same time separate the bay from the slough, forcing the tidal currents to have full effect in opening and maintaining the channel in a desirable position. After finishing the southern training-wall it may be found necessary to build an additional one, as indicated by the broken lines on chart, so as further to regulate the flow and keep the new channel free from drifting sands that may be brought in by the northwest winds. The tops of these walls should be built to 3 feet above low water, with abutments at their sea ends carried up to above high-water level.

The prevailing winter winds, which are the most boisterous, are those from the southwest, and make the entrance, as it is now, very dangerous. Vessels are forced to run through a narrow channel with their broadsides to the wind; but if the channel be regulated by the training-wall, as proposed, the danger would be greatly decreased, and the entrance made comparatively safe. In the construction of the training-walls stone or other material will have to be used which are proof against sea insects, as they are very destructive in the bay. The wharf-piles at Empire City, four miles from its entrance, are badly cut by them.

The following is an approximate estimate of the cost of proposed improvement:

Southern training-wall, 8,000 feet, at $70 per foot	$560,000 00
Northern training-wall, 5,000 feet, at $70 per foot	350,000 00
Two abutments, at $8,000 each	16,000 00
Contingencies, 5 per cent	46,000 00
Total	972,000 00

Respectfully submitted.

CHANNING M. BOLTON,
Assistant Engineer.

Colonel JOHN M. WILSON, Corps of Engineers.

REVISION OF THE PATENT LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. HOWE to the amendment of Mr. WINDOM.

The amendment of Mr. WINDOM was, to insert at the end of line 20, section 1:

No recovery of damages or costs shall be had against the defendant in any suit brought for the alleged infringement of a patent by the use of any patented device, process, invention, or discovery, if it shall appear that the defendant purchased the same for his own private use from the manufacturer thereof or from a dealer engaged in the open sale of the same, unless it shall also appear that the defendant at the time of such purchase had knowledge or actual notice of the existence of such patent, but this provision shall not apply to purchasers from foreign manufacturers or dealers.

The amendment to the amendment was, to insert in line 3 of the amendment, after the word "patent," the words "hereafter issued;" so as to read:

No recovery of damages or costs shall be had against the defendant in any suit brought for the alleged infringement of a patent hereafter issued by the use of any patented device, process, invention, or discovery, &c.

The VICE-PRESIDENT put the question on the amendment to the amendment and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

Mr. BOOTH. Mr. President, there seems to be a general agreement among all Senators upon two propositions: first, that the integrity of the patent law should be preserved, so that every inventor bona fide shall be entitled to the exclusive use of the thing he invents for the term prescribed by law; second, that the public shall be protected from imposition and innocent purchasers from harassing litigation and extortion. The committee have had both these objects steadily in view, and they have endeavored, so far as lay within their power, to frame the provisions of this bill to accomplish this double result.

It is perhaps unfortunate that this discussion has sprung up upon a single section before the subsequent provisions of the bill have been considered, which have been prepared expressly to remove as far as possible and to ameliorate where they could not be absolutely removed the hardships of which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] so eloquently complains.

The constitutional provision on the subject is as follows:

The Congress shall have power to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

The language clearly implies that the primary object was to promote the progress of science and the useful arts, and that that was of far more value to the public, to society, than the rewards which were secured to authors and inventors. Of course it is possible for Congress to decline to exercise this power at all, but if it does exercise it it must exercise it within the limits of the Constitution itself, as was so clearly and forcibly shown by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] yesterday. If any right is granted to the inventor, it must be an exclusive right for the term prescribed.

Now, how can that be an exclusive right if Congress says by law that a person other than the inventor may use the invention and not be liable in damages? A patent is as much property in the hands of its owner as a horse or an ox. From its incorporeal nature it is impossible to punish its piracy by criminal law as you do the larceny of personal property. The committee were unanimously of opinion that the inventor would be stripped of all his security if he were not allowed to follow the patented thing wherever he could find it, not that he might bring vexatious and annoying suits against every one who might innocently use a device, but in order that he might cut off the market against a piratical manufacturer.

Examine for one moment, Mr. President, the nature of the contract between the Government and the patentee. A is the author of a valuable invention of the electric light, of a new motive power, of a magnetic telegraph, of a telephone. It is in his power to lock his secret in his brain, to carry it with him to the grave, or to practice it in secret for his own emolument. The Government says to him, "Make your invention public, declare it to the world so that all men may know what it is, and you shall have the exclusive right to its enjoyment for a limited number of years, and then it shall become absolutely free." Now, this is a contract to the advantage of both parties, to the advantage of the public and of the inventor; but the public is largely the gainer by the contract. Even in the life of the patent of every valuable invention four-fifths of the savings inure to the public; and who can estimate the money value arising from patents or inventions upon which the patent has expired, or who can calculate the far greater value that belongs to them as they enter into the elements of our advancing civilization?

I sympathize with the Senator from Minnesota in his denunciation of the men—the shysters, if that is a parliamentary term—who raid through the land disgracing the profession which he adorns, but nine times in ten these men succeed not because their claims, if adjudicated, would abide the touch-stone of the law but because their victims believe it cheaper to pay us a compromise than to contest. The patent that so moves his ire seems to have been gotten out of the Patent Office through the back door, through an excresence of the law which never ought to have been there; and there is a provision in this bill by which patents of that character, if it is of the character which he represents, can be annulled.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota says that an infringer in certain cases shall not be liable to damages unless he had actual notice of the existence of the patent. Of course that destroys the remedy in all those cases, for it is absolutely impossible that the patentee should know who is going to use his patent or that he should give notice to everybody. In the case of great manufacturing companies and railroad corporations, to whom is notice to be given? Then as to the word "knowledge" in the amendment, we know how hard it is to bring knowledge home to an individual, especially where "ignorance is bliss." But how can you bring knowledge home to a corporation that has no soul to receive it? Inventions, as has been said before, are nearly all the work of laboring-men, men who toil with their hands. In that field they seek the prizes of life and receive their patent of nobility. Under the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota these achievements of these toiling men may be absorbed by manufacturing companies and railroad corporations who simply choose to close their doors to the truth and shut their eyes to the light. Under this theory the best patent adviser of a corporation or a manufacturing company would be the lawyer who knew the least law and would always advise his clients that there was no existing patent.

But the loss does not fall, as I have indicated, chiefly upon inventors, great as that is, but by removing the incentive to invention you dry up the very spring at its source.

I trust, Mr. President, that the iniquity of the owners of the drive-well and the barbed wire, great as they are said to be, will not result in such an amazing fruition of evil.

Why, sir, great as our achievements have been in mechanical improvements there are others to come mightier than they. For hundreds of years the steam-engine was regarded as a mere mechanical toy. A power will yet be discovered so cheap and so pliant that it will unite productive capacity with individual independence. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] yesterday eloquently said that other nations excelled us in the arts, perhaps in arms, certainly in literature and science, but in the domain of mechanical invention we are easily first. It is true also that this kind of intellectual effort prominently distinguishes the age in which we live. We turn to the past for models of excellence in the fine arts and are content if we can but approach them, scarcely hoping to equal them. If we can trust to human experience the world will never know a literature richer in all the attributes of genius than that which is enshrined in the language of the Greeks; the Olympian gods will never be uncrowned; but invention has a domain wide as the secrets of nature, and day by day and year by year she is subjecting these powers to the dominion of man.

I trust, Mr. President, that no feeling will be excited, no temporary anger which will lead us to adopt a policy that will destroy the integrity of the patent system to which we owe so much.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, I desire to say a very few words further upon this point. It seems to be considered by gentlemen who oppose the amendment that its adoption will destroy our patent system, and perhaps it is thought by some that it is intended to have that result. It seems to me that this is a mistake; that if the amendment be adopted it leaves to the inventor his remedy against the man who by manufacturing infringes upon his patent; it leaves to him his remedy against the seller who by sale infringes upon his patent. It curtails him from the privilege he now has of bringing suit against the innocent purchaser, either from the manufacturer or the seller, and that only.

Now, why should that be equivalent to a destruction of the patentee's rights? How can it be? A copyright to an author is substantially as to him a patent right. The copyright is intended to secure to the author what the patent secures to the inventor; and yet the author has not the right to follow into the hands of a purchaser a book that he may have bought, published contrary to the copyright law, as I understand the law to be. If I go into a bookstore here and purchase from the bookseller a book that has been copyrighted and has been published in violation of that copyright, the author cannot follow me and bring me into the courts and compel me to pay damages. I may continue to use the book year after year and upon every additional perusal of it derive additional benefit from it, and I cannot be punished under the law. But if I buy a sausage-stuffer from a manufacturer or a vendor that has been made or sold in violation of the patentee's rights, he can pursue not only the manufacturer and the seller but myself.

Mr. HOAR. You may eat the sausages, however. [Laughter.]

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Yes. I was about to ask whether or not the invention of a sausage-stuffer is of more public benefit than the authorship of a book? Now, the question I desire to submit to gentlemen is this: If it be found not to be necessary to the protection of authors that this right which has been so much abused by following into the hands of innocent purchasers the article produced in violation of the patent should be extended to them; if it is sufficient to guard the rights of the author to allow him a remedy against the publisher or seller, why may we not try to see whether that would not be sufficient to guard as well the rights of the inventor? That an enormous abuse does exist under the existing law, I have heard no man deny. Are we not competent to deal with that abuse and remove it? It is not very complimentary to us to say so.

I think no Senator will deny that there is an enormous abuse under our present patent law. Patents are issued from your department here that the courts determine conflict with each other; one is an infringement upon the other. A man goes abroad through the land with a patent issued by your department here showing that he is the inventor of a certain article, that he has the exclusive right to manufacture and sell and use it, or to sell to others to be used, and a man buys it and uses it. Another man comes along bearing another patent from the same office precisely, and he claims that the invention that has been bought under the patent exhibited to the buyer is an infringement of another patent, and when that is proven then the man who has bought the article has to pay damages.

I do think that this thing is accumulating against our whole patent law a degree of prejudice and wrong that I am sorry to see exist, and that I am afraid will become so strong, unless something be done, as to work permanent injury to our patent law. You cannot to-day pass through the Congress of the United States a bill, however meritorious it may be, authorizing the extension of a patent; that ought not to be so; and it is so because of the prejudice against the whole system created by the abuse of which I speak.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I am not sufficiently acquainted with the subject of patents to express any very clear opinion as to the general merits of the various provisions of this bill; but it seems to me that the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota is just and proper, and I stated yesterday that I should give my support to it. I understand that amendment simply to protect an innocent person who has gone to the open market and purchased an article that has been manufactured by some person who had no right to manufacture it, because it was protected by a patent.

It is, I believe, claimed by the patentees that they have now a remedy not only against the man who may infringe their patent by manufacturing the article, but that they may follow the article manufactured into the hands of an innocent purchaser and prosecute him because he is using an article which has been improperly manufactured by somebody else. No matter how innocently he may have purchased, how openly he may have purchased it in the market, they now claim the right to follow the article manufactured into the hands of the innocent purchaser and prosecute him for the use of an article which ought not to have been manufactured by somebody else. It has always seemed to me that that was very unreasonable. I suppose that every lawyer in this body has in the course of his practice had gentlemen come to him and consult him, saying they were threatened with suit because they were using an article which the patentee said they had no right to use because they had not purchased it from him. I have had in my practice, I know, frequent cases of this kind. I have invariably instructed the parties to disregard the claims of the patentees and to throw themselves upon the equitable consideration of a jury of the country in case they were innocent purchasers of the article. I believe it is right that we should protect them, and the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota does protect innocent purchasers of that character, and it is for that reason that I stated yesterday very hurriedly that I would support the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

These patentees claim the right not only to deprive every man who is using an article which he may have purchased in open market of the article, but they claim the right to constitute him a vigilance committee for the benefit of the patentee. They would require every man in the country before he goes to purchase an article to inquire into the right of the man who manufactured it to do so. How can this be? Why, sir, suppose a man's harvest was on hand, and his reaping-machine gave way, must he go and inquire and ascertain definitely before he purchases another whether it has been manufactured by an infringer of somebody's patent? Or suppose a man is sick and goes to the druggist's and some patent nostrum is recommended as a specific for his disease, must he stop to inquire whether the man who has manufactured that preparation has not infringed somebody's patent? Why, sir, if a man buys innocently in the open market that which is for sale he has a prima facie right to it, and I would give no man by any legislation of mine a remedy against him for doing so.

The amendment of the Senator from Minnesota seeks to protect only such persons as have purchased innocently, fairly, and in open market, not by any collusion with persons who have infringed a patent; and I think, therefore, his amendment is eminently proper. The patentee has his remedy against the man who infringes his patent, against the man who goes in violation of law and manufactures what he has no right to manufacture. But the argument is urged that very frequently he has no remedy because it may be that the person who has infringed the patent is insolvent, and if you take away his remedy against the person who uses the article, however innocent he may be, then he is without remedy. That may be his misfortune. In this life we are all subject to misfortunes, and I know of no reason why a patentee has any greater claim upon Congress to guard and protect his interests than any other persons have. We give him laws enabling him to prosecute any man who infringes his patent; and when we have done that we hand him over to his remedies under the law; but do not propose to give him a remedy against every man who has innocently used an article which has been manufactured in violation of some patent.

I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I believe my colleague [Mr. BURNSIDE] gave notice that at one o'clock to-day he would ask permission of the Senate to make some remarks upon the military bill. I suggest that the pending business be laid aside informally if my colleague is ready to proceed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To this the Chair hears no objection. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] calls up the bill on which he desires to speak.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S No. 1491) to reduce and reorganize the Army of the United States, and to make rules for its government and regulation.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, the bill reported by the joint committee on the reorganization of the Army is voluminous, not because an entire change has been made in all the laws relative to the Army and its government, but because it is a combination of all the new sections proposed by the committee, the unchanged sections, and certain regulations and customs of service which it is now proposed to make law.

The committee deemed it wise to report a condensed code made up of all laws relating to the Army and arranged in proper order. Officers of the Army as a body are law-abiding men. They will often question the wisdom and propriety of regulations made by their superiors in authority, but they rarely question the law. Nearly all the troubles between the staff and the line—and they have been numerous—have arisen from uncertainty as to the meaning and authority of regulations and customs of service. For this reason many of the regulations and customs of service have been ingrafted upon this bill, and if it meets with favorable action from Congress they will become law, and cease to be subjects of discussion and discord.

In preparing the part of the bill which relates to reorganization the committee tried to keep in view both the efficiency and economy of the service. The action of the last session of Congress in reference to the size of the Army was taken as a guide by the committee, and they at once settled upon twenty-five thousand soldiers as the basis of organization. It was then decided that the number of general officers designated in the bill was the minimum number required for a force of this size, and I believe no one will contend that the bill provides for too many general officers.

It was decided after much discussion that the small battalion organization, which means three or more battalions to a regiment, is better adapted to modern arms and modern warfare than our old regimental or large battalion organization, which is one battalion to a regiment, and that system was ingrafted upon the bill. It was then decided that the staff department should be so reorganized as to give to the officers of the line education and experience as staff officers and staff officers education and experience as line officers.

To accomplish this it was necessary to make parts of the corps of the line skeleton organizations and to make large reductions in the number of officers in the staff departments.

It was also decided to make the organization an elastic one; so that the Army in a sudden emergency can be rapidly increased in rank and file and company officers, without necessarily increasing the number of general, field, or staff officers.

The bill proposes that the regiments be composed of four battalions, three of which are to be officered permanently. It also proposes that in the infantry and artillery regiments but two of the battalions shall be manned, but in the cavalry regiments three battalions shall be manned for the present; and the company officers not on duty with battalions shall be detailable for duty in the staff departments, and shall be changed from time to time as provided for in the bill.

The proportion of the different arms to each other was decided upon as follows, namely: Five regiments of artillery, eight regiments of cavalry, and eighteen regiments of infantry. It is most likely that a few years hence some of the cavalry regiments can be changed to infantry and thus diminish the expense of the Army. The elasticity is provided for by giving to the President the authority to increase the number of soldiers in each company to one hundred in the cavalry and to one hundred and twenty-five in the infantry and artillery, to transfer soldiers from one company or battalion to another, and to man the unmanned third battalions, provided that until otherwise ordered by Congress the number of soldiers shall not exceed twenty-five thousand: but in case an emergency should arise to require Congress to authorize a large increase of force, the President can at once officer and man the fourth battalions, and thus place the regiments upon a war footing, which will give the cavalry regiments sixteen hundred men each and the infantry two thousand men each, making if necessary an aggregate force, including engineer soldiers, of about sixty thousand men, without increasing the number of regimental organizations.

The interchangeability between the line and the staff is established by making all the officers of the staff department below the rank of major detailable from the line of the Army, as heretofore indicated, and reducing the number of field officers of the staff departments to the number absolutely required for the present service. Promotion among the field officers in these staff departments is to be made by seniority, except as to the chiefs, who can be selected from the field officers of any corps in the Army. As vacancies in the lowest grade occur they are to be filled by officers of the line who have shown merit and efficiency in their service in said departments. The result of this reorganization will be to diminish the number of officers on the active list by three hundred and thirty-three.

The bill explains itself fully as to the method of taking care of the officers on the retired and reserved lists, and the committee feel that its provisions on this subject are liberal. None of the general officers are to be thrown out of service at once, but no promotions are to be made uptil they have been reduced to five, and thereafter the number shall not exceed six.

The question of consolidation of ordnance and artillery was freely discussed, and while it was the unanimous opinion of the committee that artillery officers should have opportunity to become experts in all the duties pertaining to the ordnance department, it was thought best not to merge the two corps, but to reduce the Ordnance Corps to the number of officers designated in the bill, all of whom are to be field officers, and to detail for duty in that department captains and first lieutenants of the artillery, and to supply the field officers as vacancies occur from the artillery officers who have shown efficiency in the department.

It was decided by the committee to provide in the bill that no more arms be manufactured by the ordnance department, but that they should be purchased either by contract or in the open market. It must be manifest to every one that action of this kind will stimulate the invention and manufacture of arms throughout the country, and that under this system the Government can more readily supply itself with efficient arms in case of an emergency than it could under the present system. To say that the arms procured by the Government in this way will not be as serviceable as if manufactured by the Government is to say that ordnance officers will become less expert as inspectors under the new system than under the old, which I cannot believe. No badly manufactured arms will be received by the Government of the United States, except by the neglect, incapacity, or dishonesty of the inspecting officers.

The Engineer Corps is not changed in this organization, because it was thought that their duties are such as to render the system of interchangeability in their case unadvisable.

It has been said by the opponents of this bill that it curtails the powers of the Secretary of War. Now, Mr. President, I will explain in a hurried way the sections in the bill which refer to the Secretary of War, from which it will be seen that in no way is the attempt made to abridge his powers, but that they are as full and distinct as they can be made under the Constitution and larger than they are now made by statute law.

There are but two sections in that part of the bill relating to the organization which in any way change the powers or duties of the Secretary of War, the seventh and thirty-seventh. Section 7 provides:

That an officer assigned to duty or command, according to his brevet as a general officer, may, under special sanction of the President, have the aids-de-camp allotted to the grade in which he is assigned to duty.

The only change in this section is that "the President" is inserted instead of "the Secretary of War;" and as the Secretary of War is the regular constitutional organ of the President for "the administration of the military establishment of the nation," no harm can result to his authority by the change.

The change in section 37 is similar to that in section 7. The words "the President" are inserted instead of "the Secretary of War." In that part of the bill referring to the Military Academy there are three sections relating to the powers of the Secretary, sections 44, 46, and 53. In the two first named the President is substituted for the Secretary of War, and by section 53 a new power (to organize a board of officers) is given to the Secretary. In that part of the bill relating to the War Department, the headquarters of the Army, &c., the first section which relates to the Secretary of War is the seventy-fifth; and to this I desire to call special attention. It reads as follows:

That the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President, shall exercise supervision and control over all branches of the military service, not only in those cases where his supervision and control are specially required by law, but in all cases embraced within the functions of the President as Commander-in-Chief of the land forces; and such supervision and control may be exercised by the Secretary of War as circumstances may require, either directly or through the Commanding General of the Army, and other officers of the Army, or through such agents as the Secretary may appoint in accordance with law.

Powers more ample than these cannot, in my opinion, be given under the Constitution. Section 77 reads as follows:

That the Adjutant-General, the Chief of Engineers, the Quartermaster-General, the Commissary-General of Subsistence, the Chief of Ordnance, the Surgeon-General, the Paymaster-General, the Chief Signal-Officer, and the Judge-Advocate-General, shall, for the administrative service of their several departments and bureaus, be chiefs of bureau in the War Department, and with their assistants shall be stationed at the seat of Government.

Section 79 reads as follows:

That the chiefs of bureaus shall act under the immediate direction and control of the Secretary of War, in all matters of accountability and administration not connected with military operations; and they shall act also as chiefs of staff to the commanding general of the Army, and as such they shall report directly to him, and act under his immediate orders in all matters appertaining to the command of the Army.

These two sections place the bureaus, and all matters of their administration not connected with military operations, under the exclusive control of the Secretary of War.

Section 82 provides:

That all orders relating to military operations, stations, or movements of troops, or to the discipline of the Army, and all orders or regulations for its general information or government, whether originating with the commanding general of the Army or directed by the President or Secretary of War, shall be issued from the headquarters of the Army.

This takes no power from the Secretary, but provides that the commanding general may be all the time in possession of proper information.

Section 83 reads as follows:

That the chiefs of bureau may issue orders to, and correspond directly with, the subordinate officers of their respective corps, departments, or bureaus, in respect to the manner of transacting business, to accounts, returns, and other details; but all official correspondence upon subjects of which commanding officers should have knowledge, and of this the commanding general of the Army shall be the judge, shall be transmitted through the headquarters of the Army, and through the subordinate commanders.

This section takes no power from the Secretary and makes the departments independent in all matters pertaining to administrative details of their offices. Section 120 reads as follows:

That details for duty in the general staff, other than aids-de-camp, and in the several staff departments and bureaus, except as provided in sections 28 and 46 of this act, shall be made by the President by selections from nominations submitted by the commanding general of the Army: Provided, That except in cases of emergency no officer shall be thus detailed against his will, nor in any case till he has served at least six years with his regiment, and that no such details shall be for a longer period than three years, or, except at the Military Academy, for two successive terms, in the same department of the staff; and that as far as may be these details, except for ordnance duty, shall be equalized between the corps of artillery, cavalry, and infantry.

This is one of the sections which it has been contended takes power from the Secretary of War. He has never had this power, and he is not supposed to be as well acquainted with the qualification of officers of the Army as the commanding general. The general-in-chief, by this section, has not the power to appoint these officers, but he is simply required to recommend them to the President for appointment. I know of no one who is better qualified to recommend than he. This section is new and pertains to the new organization. The committee deemed it wise to lodge this new power of reorganization where it will be wielded with efficiency. It can scarcely be called a new power, for after the recommendation is made the President need not act upon it, but may call for a new nomination.

Some of the sections of the bill have in them the following language:

Under the direction of the Secretary of War and the orders of the commanding general.

This language is used because the duties contemplated by this section are of a mixed nature, partly administrative, pertaining to the duties of the Secretary of War, and partly of a military nature, and as the commanding general is always subordinate to the Secretary, no assumption of power by him can occur.

Then, there are five classes of sections in the bill which pertain to the power of the Secretary:

First. Those in which it is proposed to substitute the President for the Secretary.

Second. Those in which the Secretary's power is unchanged.

Third. Those in which the Secretary and commanding general of the Army are jointly named.

Fourth. Those in which new authority or duty is placed upon the Secretary.

Fifth. Those in which authority is transferred from the Secretary to the commanding general.

In the first class are the following sections: Nos. 7, 37, 44, and 568.

In the second class are the following: Nos. 46, 75, 77, 79, 402, 403, 406, 442, 449, 459, 461, 467, 470, 472, 492, 495, 500, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 586, 604, 605, 608, 617, 622, and 634.

In the third class are the following: Nos. 519, 570, 591, and 628.

In the fourth class are the following: Nos. 262 and 404.

In the fifth class are the following: Nos. 83, 120, 153, 206, 571, and 707.

Some of the sections of the first class have already been referred to, so that no further discussion on that class is necessary. There can surely be no wrong in substituting the President for the Secretary. Neither is it necessary to make further discussion upon the sections in the second class, as they leave the power of the Secretary unchanged.

The sections in the third class have been referred to incidentally, but as there are but four of them it may not be amiss to treat them more in detail. Section 519 places the subsistence department of the Army "under the direction of the Secretary of War, and the orders of the commanding general of the Army." Truly this is a proper provision. It is under the direction of the Secretary of War in all matters relating to the purchase of supplies and the accountability for moneys, but in all matters relating to the movements and subsistence of troops it is under the orders of the commanding general.

Section 570 places the Chief of Engineers "under the direction of the Secretary of War and the orders of the commanding general," and this is also very proper. Foregoing sections give the Secretary of War full control and supervision of all the administrative duties of that bureau, but it is subject to the orders of the commanding general of the Army in all matters of a military character.

Section 591 relates to the inspection of arsenals, armories and ordnance depots, and simply gives authority to both the Secretary of War and the commanding general to order such inspections as they may deem necessary.

Section 628 authorizes both the Secretary of War and the commanding general of the Army to assign medical directors to duty. There is great propriety in the arrangement of duties made by these sections.

Of the fourth class, which gives new power to the Secretary of War, I need say nothing. An examination of these sections will show that the new powers given to him are very proper.

It remains now to speak of those sections included in the fifth class. Section 83 provides that correspondence between the heads of bureaus and their subordinates of a military nature shall pass through the military commanders. It needs no argument to sustain the propriety of this section.

Section 120 relates to the detail for staff duty by the President upon the recommendation of the commanding general. It will be remembered that this section has been discussed in my preceding remarks, and needs no further notice here.

Section 153 provides that the general staff shall be "under the direction of the Secretary of War and the orders of the commanding general and subordinate commanders." An examination of this section will show that the Secretary of War has entire control and supervision of this department in all administrative affairs, but in affairs purely military it is very properly subject to the orders of military commanders.

Section 206 transfers the direction of the recruiting service from the Secretary of War to the commanding general. This duty has from time to time devolved upon the general in command of the Army, and should be there now. Who better than he should know how to direct it?

Section 571 gives to the commanding general the power to assign engineer officers or soldiers to such duties as the service may require. It is proper that this power should vest in him, and if he wields it against the best interests of the service the Secretary of War has the authority to correct him.

Section 707 relates to the Signal Bureau, and places it under the orders of the commanding general in all military affairs, but leaves it under the direction of the Secretary of War in all matters relating to the meteorological observations and reports required by law. Thus it will be seen that all the civil duties of this department are under the direction of the Secretary of War, and all the military duties are under the orders of the commanding general, which, I submit, is a very proper arrangement.

It now remains to discuss the sections in the bill which relate to the commanding general of the Army, which may be classed as follows:

1. Those in which his authority is unchanged.
2. Those in which new authority is given to him.

The sections in which he holds joint authority with the Secretary of War have already been discussed.

In the first class are the following sections: 86, 127, 129, 171, 196, 253, 254, 271, 410.

In the second class are the following sections: 30, 81, 121, 124, 284, 435.

Of the first class I need not speak, as they confer no new authority.

Of the second class, section 30 authorizes the commanding general to station artillery companies as guards at the arsenals, which is a change incident to the new organization.

Section 81 gives authority to the commanding general to designate to the President a general officer to perform his duties at the seat of Government when his presence is required with the armies in the field, which is a very proper authority for the commanding general to exercise.

Section 121 gives him authority to maintain a due proportion of officers with each regiment and the staff departments by necessary transfers.

Section 124 gives him authority to assign staff, bureau, and engineer officers, but leaves the power of supervision with the President and Secretary of War.

Section 284 gives him the entire control of the transfers of enlisted men. I submit that the powers conferred by these sections are very proper ones to be left in his hands.

Section 435 requires the chiefs of bureaus to make annual reports to the commanding general of the operations of their departments. To this there can surely be no objection.

I have now treated of all the sections in the bill relating to the authority conferred upon the Secretary of War and the commanding general.

And now I wish to say that even in the earliest days of our Government the Secretary or War was not considered a part of the Army, and was not considered the proper person to perform the military duties appertaining to the Army. On January 25, 1821, when some question arose as to this matter, William Wirt, then Attorney-General, gave this opinion of the Secretary of War:

He does not compose a part of the Army and has no duties to perform in the field.—1 Opinions Attorney-General, 457.

I could cite numerous decisions of the same kind by the courts and different Attorneys-General all tending the same way.

He is a civil officer and all his duties are civil duties.—4 Nott & Huntington, 125.

Yet he is—

The regular constitutional organ of the President for the administration of the military establishment of the nation, and rules and orders publicly promulgated through him must be received as the acts of the Executive and as such to be binding upon all within the sphere of his legal and constitutional authority. (See United States vs. Eliason, 16 Peters, 291; and Wilcox vs. Jackson, 13 Ibid., 498.)

The President of the United States has the right to place in command of the Army any one of the general officers. If he at any time finds that the general officer who is detailed for the performance of the duties of Commanding General of the Army is at all disinclined to acquiesce in orders issued by him, or is at all disinclined to co-operate with him in his directions with reference to the Army, he can at once be relieved and a new officer detailed in his stead. So that he is all the time under the control of the President of the United States and the Secretary of War.

Another objection that I have heard to this bill is that it is too long for consideration at this session. As I have before said, Mr. President, the bill is intended for a military code, and is made up of existing laws, regulations, and customs of the service which it is proposed to make law, and sections entirely new.

I will now give a list of every section in this bill containing new matter of importance so that they can be readily referred to, and Senators will discover that no new power has been given to any military officer and no new section has been added which has not been added with a view to making the new organization complete.

The following are the sections containing new matter that may be deemed important, not already discussed:

Organization, sections 1–43; Military Academy, sections 44–47, 50, 52, 53, 55, 59, 62, 68, 70, 73, 74; War Department, &c., sections 76, 78, 81; rank and precedence, sections 87, 92, 93; appointments, sections 94, 95, 96, 97, 100, 101, 102, 104; promotions, sections 107, 110, 111; brevets, &c., sections 112–118; staff details and assignments, sections 122, 123; command, sections 128, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 143; the general staff, sections 166, 168, 186, 190; the inspection service; the recruiting service, sections 207, 210, 221; regiments and companies, sections 222, 223, 224, 233, 234; military posts, section 249; instruction of the troops, sections 250, 251, 256, 257, 259; military instruction at colleges, sections 261–265; exchanges and transfers, sections 282, 289; discharges, sections 297, 298, 299; retired officers, sections 300–317; Soldier's Home, sections 319, 320; the roster, &c., section 341; extra and fatigue duty, sections 344, 346; Army administration, sections 405, 414, 415, 421, 429, 430, 431, 443, 446; Quartermaster's Department, sections 451, 453, 454, 457, 460, 462, 469, 488, 490, 494, 501, 505, 506; subsistence department, sections 520, 521, 551, 552, 554, 555, 556; fortification and armament, &c., sections 562, 567; the Corps of Engineers, sections 572, 581, 582; the ordnance department, sections 589, 594, 595, 610, 620; the medical department, section 628; the pay department, sections 669, 686, 699, 700, 705, 706; Bureau of Military Justice, sections 715, 717, 718, 720; articles of war, section 721; articles 1, 3, 5, 9, 13, 14, 15, 18, 25, 29, 32, 33, 38, 40, 41, 46, 47, 61, 63, 71, 72, 73, 74, 76, 77, 78, 86, 89, 92, 93, 102, 105, 106, 107, 108, 112, 113, 114, 120, 122, 125, 126, 128, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145—sections 723, 724.

The details of the bill relating to forage, fuel, quarters, &c., I have not touched upon, but I will be glad to give when the bill comes up for consideration such explanations as may be called for. The task of framing a bill to reduce the Army has not been a pleasant one to the committee, and could I feel that the best interests of the country and of the Army would be served by the failure of this bill, I would gladly oppose its passage, and would be delighted to know that none of my old friends in the Army were to be disturbed in their positions. But, Mr. President, I am satisfied that reorganization and reform is necessary, and unless it is accomplished under some systematic and considerate plan, reduction will be very soon made under a hasty and inconsiderate plan. It seems to me, therefore, very unwise in officers of the Army, and particularly in the officers of the staff departments, to resist proper legislation touching this subject.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. President, before the Senator from Rhode Island concludes his remarks in support of the bill, I desire to call his attention to one matter that struck me in listening to him. He has defended the bill against the charge of having reduced the existing power of the Secretary of War. But I observe that in his remarks, and in his extracts from the bill itself, he quotes passages which he says confer a new power upon the commanding general. If I understood them rightly, they limit the power of the Commander-in-Chief, the President of the United States, in making appointments in the Army by way of promotion and by way of special detail; and I should like the Senator from Rhode Island to answer, if he is prepared to do so to-day, whether or not the bill is not in its present shape open to an objection of that kind?

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, the right of the General-in-Chief to make recommendations to the President of the United States and to the Secretary of War touching promotions in the Army has always existed. This simply indicates the way and manner of appointment by the President—that certain officers shall be appointed by the President upon the recommendation of the commanding general. If the President chooses to decline to appoint on the recommendation of the commanding general, he can do so, and he can call for a new recommendation.

Mr. MATTHEWS. But can he appoint under the bill, if it becomes a law, any one who is not recommended by the commanding general?

Mr. BURNSIDE. He cannot. It is the intention of the committee to provide against just that very evil in the service.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Then I repeat the inquiry whether or not the committee have considered the question in its constitutional bearings as a limitation upon what the Constitution does not limit as to the power of the President to nominate and the power of the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Army?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I will answer the Senator by saying that it limits him no more in this respect than he is now limited as to other appointments. The President appoints a cadet to West Point, but he cannot appoint him under the present law or custom unless he is recommended by the member of Congress from the district from which that cadet is to be appointed. There are a great many other things in which he is limited. He can appoint officers from certain classes. Under this bill he cannot appoint an officer in the staff departments unless he is in the Army. If you can say he cannot appoint an officer in the staff departments unless he is in the Army, you can say that he cannot appoint him unless by competitive examination, which the bill provides for, he has shown himself capable for the office and unless he is recommended by the commanding general of the Army, who is the man best suited to judge of the capacity of officers.

This section, as I said before, is entirely new and is put in as a feature of this organization. The junior officers in the staff departments are from time to time to be promoted to vacancies in the departments, vacancies of field officers; and so there must be some method by which the appointments can be made. Otherwise they will be left entirely to the will of the President, and the President can make them from any part of the Army without reference to their service in the department—can make them, in other words, at the solicitation of friends outside of the Army, and friends who know nothing about the subject. This section is put in to insure efficiency in the staff departments; in other words to provide that none but qualified officers shall go into those departments. It is a power that has never existed with the Secretary of War, because no such section was in the statutes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will now be returned to its place on the Calendar, and the consideration of the special order will be resumed.

MAIL TRANSPORTATION DEFICIENCY.

Mr. DORSEY. With the consent of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. WADLEIGH,] I ask the Senate now to proceed to the consideration of the House bill No. 5682, a bill to make an appropriation for a deficiency in the Post-Office Department.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the pending order be informally laid aside for the purpose of considering at this time House bill No. 5682.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 5682) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for transportation of mails by railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879. It appropriates $450,000 to meet the deficiency in the appropriation for the transportation of mails by railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879; but no increase in the postal-car service beyond what existed on the 1st of December, 1878, is to be made during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT BONDS.

Mr. DORSEY. Now, with the consent of the Senator in charge of the pending measure, I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5683) to amend an act approved June 20, 1878, and to fix the rate of interest on bonds authorized by said act to be issued by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes. This is the bill which I reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia last evening, and which was laid over under objection. It is a very important measure and should be passed, so as to go into effect before the 1st of January.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read.

Mr. WHYTE. For information.

Mr. DORSEY. If the Senator from New Hampshire does not object——

Mr. WADLEIGH. I do not object because I understand it will not lead to discussion. If it is likely to lead to discussion I shall object. I reserve the right at any time to call for the regular order.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. There is no doubt that there will be discussion on the bill. I say that to the Senator before he proceeds.

Mr. DORSEY. I think if the Senate understands the bill there will be no objection to taking it up now. The District of Columbia has on the 1st day of January $281,000 of its funded debt falling due. Provision was made at the last session of Congress to pay this debt, and the District commissioners were authorized to issue bonds to redeem the bonds maturing at the time named; but that provision, or a portion of it, was omitted in the enrollment of the sundry civil appropriation bill, and we find now that within two weeks of the time this debt is due these people have no authority to redeem it and no means to redeem it with. This bill simply provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue new bonds and take up the old as they fall due. If the Senate want to allow the District of Columbia to default upon its obligations, I have no more interest in it than the rest of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have not read the bill; I do not know its provisions, and do not know but that it may be all right. I have no objection to its being taken up; but beyond doubt it will lead to discussion.

Mr. DORSEY. I think not.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I know what I am talking about, the Senator will allow me to say.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the provision of the act making appropriation for sundry civil expenses, approved June 20, 1878, authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to issue bonds to redeem certain bonds of said District falling due January 1 and March 1, 1879, be, and the same is hereby, amended so that the last clause of the paragraph containing said provision shall read as follows: "Said bonds shall be registered or coupon bonds, and shall be of the denomination of $100 or $500, or both, and shall be payable twenty years after date, and bearing a rate of interest not exceeding 6 per cent., and not to be sold for less than their par value, and to be awarded to the most favorable bidder or bidders, after having been advertised by the Treasurer of the United States, as sinking-fund commissioner of said District, for ten successive insertions in two daily papers in Washington and two in New York, the bids to be opened in the presence of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the award to be subject to his approval."

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to advance to the sinking-fund commissioner, upon requisition of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, a sum not exceeding $281,500 to pay the bonds of said District falling due as aforesaid; and the amount so advanced shall be reimbursed to the United States from the sale of the bonds to be issued in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be authorized to expend a sum not exceeding $10,000 to defray the expenses of the reassessment of real property and taking the census in said District, as directed in the act of Congress approved April 3, 1878.

Mr. KERNAN. I do not rise to object to this bill, but I desire some explanation, and to enable the chairman to give it I ask that an extract from the report of the Treasurer of the United States, who is ex officio commissioner of the District sinking fund, be read, and then let there be an explanation of the bill, and especially of the appropriation of $10,000 in the last section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The paper will be read.

Mr. KERNAN. It was stated yesterday that these old bonds were 7 per cent. bonds. I think they are 6 per cent., the same as this bill provides for. I ask the Secretary to read what is marked in the report of the Treasurer.

The Secretary read as follows:

On the 1st of January next $279,000 of the 6 per cent. ten-year bonds of the corporation of Washington become due and payable, and on the 1st of next March $2,500 of the 7.30 steam-force-pump bonds of the corporation of Georgetown become due and payable. To provide for the redemption of these loans at maturity Congress at its last session provided for the issue of $281,750 thirty-year —— per cent. bonds to take their place. On November 29 the commissioner of the sinking fund made the following offer to the commissioners of the District:

"As commissioner of the sinking fund of the District of Columbia, I have the honor to make the following proposition, subject to whatever action by Congress is necessary to sanction the transaction. For the benefit of the sinking fund I will subscribe at par for so many of the thirty-year bonds authorized by the act of June 20, 1878, as can be paid for from the amount to be appropriated for the sinking fund for the current fiscal year, and will take the remainder on July 1, 1879, to be paid for from the appropriation for the sinking fund for the fiscal year 1880.

"I need not say that this proposition, if accepted, will avoid the expense of preparing and issuing the bonds, and will give the sinking fund the benefit of the interest thereon, and avoid future payment of premium and other expense of retiring them ultimately."

Mr. DORSEY. If the commissioner of the District sinking fund, who is the Treasurer of the United States, proposed to take up all these bonds now, it would enable the commissioners to pay off this maturing debt; but he proposes no such thing. He proposes to take only a portion of them on the 1st of January and the larger portion on the 1st of next July, six months after the debt is due and payable.

Now, Mr. President, I send to the Secretary a letter from the District commissioners on this subject.

Mr. KERNAN. The point I desire the Senator to observe is that the commissioner of the sinking fund says:

I need not say that this proposition, if accepted, will avoid the expense of preparing and issuing the bonds, and will give the sinking fund the benefit of the interest thereon, and avoid future payment of premium and other expense of retiring them ultimately.

He seems to think this proposition of his will avoid expense. I do not understand why the law should be changed as this bill proposes. The other law authorized the issuing of the bonds. This is not a transcript of the other, but changes it in some respects.

Mr. DORSEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KERNAN. I want to understand why that is, and why his proposition is not a good one.

Mr. DORSEY. The Senator from New York will see that his proposition is not good because he does not propose to take up all these bonds when due. Two hundred and seventy-nine thousand dollars 6 per cent. bonds are due on the 1st of January, and $2,500 of 7.30 percents are due on the 1st of March. The commissioner of the sinking fund proposes to take up only a small portion in January and the balance next July, and the result would be a default of six months from the time the whole amount is due by the District.

In regard to the last item to which the Senator from New York alluded—an appropriation of $10,000—that is for an entirely distinct matter. The District commissioners made their estimates last December, and revised them again in April, for the expenses of the District government. After these estimates were made and the appropriations were based upon them by the House, we passed a bill reorganizing the government of the District. In that bill we required the District commissioners to reassess the property of the District and take a census. They had not estimated for any money for that purpose, and we did not appropriate any. Now they find themselves under the law required to make this reassessment and this census without the money to do it. That work ought to be done at once.

Mr. KERNAN. This does not appropriate any money to that; at least that was not what I alluded to.

Mr. DORSEY. Yes, sir; section 3 appropriates $10,000 for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter sent to the desk by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DORSEY] will be read for information.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, December 9, 1878.

SIR: The commissioners of the District have prepared amendments to the act authorizing them to issue bonds to redeem those falling due January 1 and March 1 next, and respectfully submit them for consideration of your committee. The omission of a rate of interest in engrossing the sundry civil bill of last session renders that part of the act respecting the issue of those bonds defective. There are some changes in the provisions of the law besides the correction of that error which we think it desirable to introduce with a view to improving the chances of a favorable sale of the securities.

A month ago when call loans were made at 7 per cent. there was not much probability of selling a 5 per cent. bond of the District at par. With the present cheaper rate for money the chance is improved.

The second section confers authority to pay the expenses of a reassessment of real estate and taking the census in the District. The law passed in April, while the estimates to which the commissioners are confined in their expenditures were submitted to Congress in January. These estimates were hastily amended in June, but the additional expense created by the assessment and census was overlooked. An extended resurvey was found necessary in Georgetown, where the system of tax levy in former years was different from that followed in Washington, and a numerical book is now prepared for the first time for that city.

By order of the board.

S. L. PHELPS, President.

Hon. A. S. WILLIAMS,
Chairman Committee on District of Columbia, House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I should like an explanation from the chairman of the committee. Let me ask what interest do the bonds now existing bear?

Mr. DORSEY. Two hundred and seventy-nine thousand dollars that we propose to redeem bear 6 per cent. interest, and $2,500 bear 7.3 per cent. interest.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then I understand that the bonds now in existence bear 6 and 7.3 per cent. interest. Now, will the Senator be kind enough to inform us why it is that he wants the Treasury of the United States to advance the money called for in the second section?

Mr. DORSEY. It seems to me very clear that it is impossible under this bill for the District commissioners to prepare these bonds and sell them and raise the money on them between this and the 1st of January in order to redeem the bonds then maturing. That of course is a physical impossibility; they cannot do it. If the bill had become a law when it should have become a law, at the last session of Congress, then they would have had time to issue and sell these new bonds and take up the maturing bonds. Now it is proposed that the Secretary of the Treasury shall advance the money needed for this purpose, and reimburse himself out of the sale of the bonds as soon as it can be done.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If the credit of the District is what we think it ought to be and what we suppose it is, it appears to me that a 5 per cent. bond ought to take the place of the 6 per cent. bond provided for in this bill. I see no reason why a bond of this District or one with which the Government of the United States has anything to do in the remotest degree should be issued at 6 per cent., why a 5 per cent. bond is not sufficient. We are selling bonds of the Government daily at 4 per cent., perhaps a million a day on an average. This bill provides, as I see, for a 6 per cent. bond. I would ask the chairman of the District Committee whether or not he has information that would lead us to believe that a 6 per cent. bond ought to be provided for here when a 5 per cent. bond probably is sufficiently high?

Mr. DORSEY. These bonds are not in any legal sense Government bonds.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope the chairman will not misunderstand me. I said that a bond which the Government in the most remote way might have anything to do with ought not to be issued with a higher rate of interest than 5 per cent.

Mr. CONKLING. Are these bonds exempt from taxation?

Mr. DORSEY. I was about to come to that point. Inasmuch as these are not Government bonds, they are subject to the same taxation that other personal property is in this District, and will be hereafter; and for that reason, if for no other—and there are many others I could give—these bonds cannot be sold in New York or elsewhere at the same rate that Government bonds are sold for. The commissioners believe that they will not be able to sell the bonds proposed to be issued under this bill for par at a lower rate of interest than 6 per cent., and they have been investigating the matter carefully.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Do I understand the Senator to say that these bonds will be subject to taxation, and that the bonds for which these are to be substituted are taxable also?

Mr. DORSEY. I presume they are, the same as other personal property.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Has the Senator information upon that question?

Mr. DORSEY. I have none except the general impression I have in regard to taxable property.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My information is the reverse, that they are not taxable.

Mr. ALLISON. These bonds?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. These bonds.

Mr. ALLISON. They are taxable.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not speak with knowledge. I asked the question and I say that my information is different.

Mr. DORSEY. I think the Senator's information is in error in that respect. These bonds are taxable in the District the same as other personal property.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

On the question of ordering the bill to a third reading, a division was called for, and the ayes were 19.

Mr. DORSEY. Let us have the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I believe it is in order now to move to strike out "six," in line 14 of section 1, and insert "five." I dislike to do it, for I have no wish to embarrass the bill, especially as the Senator says it must be passed to-day or to-morrow or else it must go over till after the recess and then the time will pass within which these bonds should be provided for. That hesitation has prevented me from making the motion previously; but as the yeas and nays are to be called I wish it understood that I shall vote against the bill on account of the rate of interest. I think 5 per cent. ought to be sufficient.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to ask for information of the Senator who has charge of the bill, whether I correctly understand him as saying that this bill was substantially passed last year making this provision, and that owing to an accidental error in the enrollment it was left out of the bill where it was designed to be, and hence the necessity for this bill.

Mr. DORSEY. The Senator from Virginia did understand me to say that, but I should have added that when the bill of last session came from the other House it provided for 6 per cent. interest and the Committee on Appropriations of this body changed it to 5 per cent., and the result was that between the two Houses they left out in the enrollment any rate of interest at all. That is the fact. I am not very strenuous in regard to the rate of interest myself.

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to ask another question. I have before me the law of June last. The rate of interest is left blank. It provides for issuing bonds with blank interest. Now, why is the law changed as it was matured then, except to fill the blank? What is the difficulty with the old law? It authorizes the issue of bonds running for twenty years. They have had since last June a law authorizing their issue. The bonds are therein defined. The only difficulty is that the rate of interest is not specified.

Mr. DORSEY. The authorities of this District did not think they had sufficient authority of law. A portion of that law was omitted in the enrollment, and they did not assume the responsibility of issuing bonds with any interest, because the law did not say what the interest should be. I believe myself 5 per cent. ought to be sufficient, and perhaps no more will be paid under this bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not understand that this bill proposes to enlarge the responsibility of the United States in the least. It is merely a District transaction. This bill allows them to renew an existing debt. Under these circumstances the Senator from West Virginia proposes that the rate of interest shall be limited to 5 per cent. Now I desire to say that I do not know of a city in the entire Union whose credit is sufficient to obtain a loan at 5 per cent.

So far as the taxation of these bonds is concerned, let me say that there are no bonds but those of the United States which are not subject to taxation. The taxation in most cities is more than 1½ or 2 per cent. Now it seems to me that the exigency of the case rather requires that we shall act upon this bill as it comes to us from the House of Representatives. I cannot see anything hidden under it to which any Senator need object. It neither increases the power nor decreases the obligation of the District in the least.

Mr. DORSEY. If the Senator from West Virginia will be good enough to look at the bill he will see that the commissioners are not required to issue these bonds at 6 per cent., unless they find it necessary to do so in order to sell them at par. If they can sell at par bonds bearing 5 per cent. interest they will do it, but if they cannot, then they are permitted to go to 6 per cent., and no further. By reading the clause beginning at line 13, the Senator will see the clear intent of the bill. While I believe 5 per cent. bonds ought to sell at par, I doubt very much whether they can be sold at that rate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have no wish to prolong the discussion, but I understood the Senator from Vermont to say that no city bonds whatever were free from taxation. I beg that Senator's pardon. I know a great many cities that exempt their bonds from taxation.

Mr. MORRILL. I did not say that. I said I knew of no city that was able to negotiate its bonds at par at so low a rate as 5 per cent. interest.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is another question. I do not know about that either. I will say to the Senator that it now occurs to me that the city of Baltimore a very short time ago asked for bids for a million dollars of bonds at 5 per cent., and my recollection is that they sold at 103 or 104. I appeal to the Senator from Maryland to know whether I am right or not. He says yes, I am right, that the neighboring city of Baltimore a few days ago issued 5 per cent. bonds at a premium.

Mr. MORRILL. Then they were exempt from taxation.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I take it so; but I understood the Senator to say a moment ago that no bonds were exempt from taxation.

Mr. MORRILL. I did not say so.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. DAWES. The radical difference between those bonds and these is this: when the city of Boston issues her bonds every particle of the real estate, whether owned by an individual or otherwise, is liable for the payment of them. If a suit be brought against the city of Boston for such a debt, a judgment recovered against the city of Boston may be levied upon the personal or real estate within its limits, no matter whether it is owned by the city or owned by a citizen of the city. That is not true of this city, and I think it is hardly true of any city outside of New England.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think the Senator is mistaken; for in the very instance we have just talked of, the city of Baltimore, its 5 per cent. bonds sold, my recollection is, for about 4 per cent. premium.

Mr. DAWES. I beg the Senator's pardon. I understood him to refer to the city of Boston.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Oh, no; Baltimore. "The neighboring city of Baltimore," I said. Mr. President, I have no wish to defeat this bill. I believe that any amendment would carry it over; and as the District Committee has thoroughly examined it and is pretty nearly unanimous upon it, I presume that it ought to pass, and I withdraw my amendment unless some Senator thinks proper to renew it. I believe these bonds ought to be negotiated at 5 per cent. Inasmuch as I see its interest is not to exceed 6 per cent. I hope that the commissioners, when they come to advertise this loan, will give the public an opportunity to take it at 5 per cent. if they wish.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from West Virginia is withdrawn. The question is on ordering the bill to a third reading, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DORSEY. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire the yeas and nays. I desire to express my sentiments by voting against the bill.

Mr. DORSEY. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered and will be taken.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 16; as follows:

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the act (S. No. 1460) to authorize the issue of certain duplicate registered bonds for the benefit of the Manhattan Savings Institution.

REVISION OF THE PATENT LAWS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of its special order, being the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes, the question being on the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I must confess to some surprise that the brief suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] in regard to the constitutionality of this proposed amendment has not evoked some discussion upon that branch of the objection to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota. Apart from the inconsistency of such an amendment with the general scope of the patent law, it strikes me that the very proposition is in the teeth of the constitutional provision on this subject. The Constitution says that—

> The Congress shall have power * * * to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

How can that be an "exclusive right" to an inventor in his discovery which allows anybody to infringe it? How can Congress exercise the power of exclusiveness in granting to an applicant for a patent under the Constitution if Congress in the very patent law excludes certain persons who are not prevented from infringing? It strikes me that there is an Irishism about the proposition that in carrying out a constitutional power to give exclusive property in the invention of a man's own brain Congress at the same time excepts certain other people who have the privilege of using it. I cannot understand that principle. Unless the grant is exclusive in its character and operates against everybody it is not a constitutional exercise of the power of Congress. It cannot be according to my understanding of the use of these words. The very word "exclusive" was put in to prevent just such a case.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. That of course is the full extent of the power to which Congress is authorized to go by the Constitution. But is it absolutely necessary, in order to promote the progress of science and the useful arts that Congress should go to the extent of making the right exclusive?

Mr. WHYTE. Yes; I think it is.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not say exactly that it is not necessary to go to the full extent, but I think it is a very serious question.

Mr. WHYTE. Either Congress must not grant the right at all, or if it exercises the constitutional power it must exercise it in the manner prescribed by the Constitution and in no other manner.

Mr. MITCHELL. There are a great many grants of power in the Constitution, and Congress has exercised those grants in a great many ways without going to the full extent of the power. It has been a serious question in my mind since this discussion came up. I do not say but what the Senator is precisely right, but it has bothered me considerably.

Mr. WHYTE. That is the very point which I make. If it was a grant of a general power to Congress to be exercised in the discretion of Congress to promote the arts and sciences, no doubt there could be limits in such cases; but the language of the Constitution is express. It is different in regard to this power from the other powers granted to Congress, because here while giving a power that power is limited. If you grant any security to an inventor it must be a security which gives him the exclusive right to the products of his own labor and invention. That is the very point in this case. Where the framers of the Constitution expressed their intention to be that such security shall be an exclusive one in favor of the inventor, the framers of the Constitution meant to say that that was an express clause put in purposely to limit the power of Congress, and not to allow Congress to grant a partial protection to any inventor. It must be exclusive in its character, not to operate against A and B, but against everybody who may infringe the man's patent; I cannot understand any such principle as to say that because a man goes into a store and there buys a patented article, simply because he does not know that it is patented, he is to use it and infringe the right of the patentee. I cannot understand any such principle as that, when you look at the object and scope of the patent law. Who doubts that the exclusive right granted by Congress under the Constitution to inventors gives a right of property to the inventor in the product of his labor and his skill? That device, that invention, is just as much his property as the horse he has purchased that stands in his stable.

Mr. MITCHELL. But, after all, he has no right of property in it, and cannot possibly have, unless the statutes of the United States give it to him. The Constitution gives him no right.

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly not; but I am speaking of his right after he has letters-patent granted by the Government of the United States. That gives him the right of property and an exclusive right against any person within the United States who infringes it, as the law now stands. Where is the difference between this case and that of a man who steals my horse and goes into the market-place and sells it to an unsuspicious buyer, and the buyer pays the horse-thief the money for the horse, its full value? The horse-thief goes on his way rejoicing, and if I come forward and find my property in the hands of the buyer of that horse, is he not bound either to return to me my property or to pay me the value of it?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is very true that the Senator may recover his horse; but I ask him this: If a party had manufactured an article by the infringement of a patent, say a wheat-machine, could the patentee go and replevy the machine which had been manufactured by the infringer? Has the patentee a right of property in that and has not the man who has purchased it of the infringer a perfect right of property in it?

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly. That is a different case because that is a mixed property. I have no right to take the man's wood; I have no right to take his nails; I have no right to take the wire which may be used in the machine; I have no right to take anything but that which belongs to me, and that is my patent which I have gotten through the action of the Congress of the United States from its Department. I cannot get that by a replevin, of course, but in lieu of that, because of the nature of the machine, I can get under the law the value of my patent which is incorporated in that machine, and I am just as much entitled to get the value of my patent incorporated in that machine as I am entitled to get my horse if I find it in my neighbor's stable. I can see no distinction. That is the practical part of the case, it is the legal branch of the case, to which I invite the constitutional lawyers of the Senate. Can that be a compliance with the Constitution of the United States which authorizes Congress only to grant letters-patent which will secure to an inventor the exclusive right to his property, when by an act of Congress you say it shall only be partially exclusive, only operate in a certain class of cases, but here is another class of cases in which it shall not be exclusive? I think, Mr. President, with great respect, the argument which goes to make this a constitutional provision is a reductio ad absurdum.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, if I may have the unanimous consent of the Senate to withdraw the pending amendment I will submit another, which I think will better accomplish the end proposed and will avoid many of the objections that have been urged against my original proposition. My only purpose is to protect the general public from legalized blackmailing and robbery, and at the same time to deprive no man of his just power to enforce any legal rights he may possess. Before asking to withdraw the amendment under discussion I will ask the Secretary to read for information the one that I shall propose in lieu of it, if unanimous consent shall be granted to withdraw the former.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be reported by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. —. In any suit brought in any court now having jurisdiction in patent cases for an alleged infringement of any patented article, device, process, invention, or discovery, where it shall appear that the defendant purchased the same from the manufacturer thereof or from a person or firm engaged in the open sale or practical application thereof, or that he manufactured or applied the same for and to his own use, and not for sale nor for making a product for sale, if the plaintiff shall recover a judgment for merely nominal damages, the court shall adjudge that he pay all the costs of the suit, and if the plaintiff shall not recover the sum of $50 or over, the court shall adjudge him to pay his own costs, unless it shall also appear that the defendant at the time of such purchase, manufacture, or practical application, had knowledge or actual notice of the existence of such patent, and that such purchase, manufacture, or practical application was an infringement of the rights of the plaintiff.

Mr. WINDOM. It will be observed that the amendment just read proposes to withhold from the use of patent-owners the circuit and district courts of the United States for the collection of mere frivolous claims unless the claimants pay their own costs. It will I think do much to cure the evils which are complained of in many portions of the Union. Take my own State as an illustration. There are to-day, as I am informed, five hundred suits for $10 each pending in the United States district court at Saint Paul. The assignees of a patent have formed a partnership with certain agents and lawyers at the capital of the State, who send the United States marshal all over it, commanding the people, in the name of the United States, to appear at Saint Paul and answer their demand for $10, thus compelling them to submit to their blackmailing extortions, or travel several hundred miles to put in an answer to the complaint. The amendment I propose will put an end to that kind of legalized villainy at once. Compel these men to give security for costs and then inform them that such suits must be conducted at their own expense, and we shall hear no more of wholesale raiding upon innocent people.

If the owner of the patent fails to recover more than nominal damages, I submit to the Senate that he ought to pay all the costs of the suit. If he does not recover more than $50 ought he not at least to pay his own costs? You open the circuit courts of the United States only to important cases. The circuit court has no jurisdiction in ordinary cases unless the sum sued for amounts to $500, and usually, if not always, the parties must be residents of different States.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Patent cases are an exception.

Mr. WINDOM. I was going to say with the exception of patent cases this is true; but if a man is armed, as I said the other day, with that sacred thing called a patent he can have the services of the United States courts for the enforcement of his demand for any sum, however small. I do not believe that is right. I do not believe that any member of the Senate thinks it is right.

The amendment to be proposed also obviates the objection made by the Senator from Massachusetts and others yesterday, that large corporations and others who use patents out of which they make great profits would be relieved. This amendment does not touch that class of cases at all, but it goes directly to the great mass of the people, and protects them from vexatious and oppressive litigation about little matters in regard to which it is far cheaper for them to pay the demand, however unjust, than to defend in the courts of the United States.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts on my left [Mr. DAWES] yesterday suggested that there was no very great mischief done, because the person using the patent, if he was compelled to pay his $5 or $10, could have recourse upon the seller and recover it. That is certainly a very valuable remedy to the person who is sued, as I have stated, in a State like Nebraska, for instance, where the marshal may be sent out two or three hundred miles with a summons against a defendant for $10. Doubtless if the patent claim be invalid the defendant may successfully defend against it by paying several hundred dollars attorney's fees and expenses; and if it be valid, and judgment be entered against him for $10, he may, by paying as much more, recover a judgment against the vendor; but I submit that such a remedy does not commend itself to the discretion of most men.

Mr. DAWES. What would be the difference between that and buying my neighbor's wagon of me, I should like to know. When my neighbor came for the wagon that I sold to the Senator from Minnesota he could have his choice either to give up my wagon or to stand a lawsuit and determine the question; and when he stood the lawsuit he would have the poor satisfaction of coming back on me for his pay. It is precisely the same except the difference in the court to which the gentleman would appeal for his remedy. The hardship of that difference in the court arises from living in such a magnificent State that it is four hundred miles across. Take the little State I live in. We are subjected to no such hardship as that. The city of Boston is within a stone's-throw of my house, and yet I live on the other side of the State. I can go to Boston and enjoy the pleasure of appearing as a defendant in a United States court at Boston just as easily as in the court of the county where I live. That grows out of physical difficulties over which I do not have any control. The real question is this, and I beg the Senator's pardon: for illustrating by him, my friend has got possession of something that does not belong to him, and he got possession of it innocently. I do not claim that he is to blame in getting possession of it, but either he or the true owner must suffer some inconvenience in consequence of that. If the true owner is not in fault, I submit to the Senator from Minnesota whether every principle of justice does not require that the individual who has possession of it, if he declines to yield to the right of the true owner, should suffer the inconvenience. I will go as far with the Senator from Minnesota as he desires me to go consistently with justice and the proper enforcement of the rights of parties in court to cheapen the process and to make speedy the method of determining the rights of individuals; but because individual cases of hardship and oppression are found under the law, I do not think it is my duty to clothe the wrong-doer with the power of depriving a man of his rights.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish the Senator from Massachusetts would come out into my State. I think it would enlarge his ideas of the rights of the people as against monopolists and patentees. It is not because of individual cases of hardship that I complain and seek to amend the law, but it is because the law itself is framed to work injustice. There is nothing else that I know of in the United States involving rights of private property except a patent which authorizes a suit to be brought in the United States circuit courts for less than $500. In all other cases the jurisdiction of that court is limited to matters of importance, involving contests between citizens of different States or of different nations, or for the adjudication of important issues bearing upon human rights, the constitutionality of certain laws, or the construction of statutes relative to revenue, &c. But if you are armed with that highly-favored prerogative known as a patent you may sue for any sum you please. If you would vindicate the criminal laws of your country, you must in most cases commence before a justice of the peace, or at most before a county court. If you would bring a suit in any of our State courts for the vindication of a private right of property, you must present a demand large enough to correspond somewhat with the dignity and respectability of the court. Not so for the vindication of your claims under a patent. In such case the royal character of the prerogative alleged to be violated seems to be enough to open any court for your redress, and in the name and by the authority of the United States you may go to the capital of a State and for a claim of $5 each you may send the United States marshal to a thousand men, or ten thousand, if so many have bought and used some trivial invention, and compel them to travel hundreds of miles to defend against your claim, or, as more frequently occurs, to pay an unjust demand as the cheapest way of meeting it.

I am willing to give the patentee all the rights that can be given to him consistently with the rights of the public; but if it has come to this, that the rights of the people cannot be defended, and that they must be insulted and plundered in order to maintain the efficiency of our patent laws, the sooner those laws are all repealed the better for the country. I have said several times in this debate that I do not think this is necessary; but I assure the Senator from Massachusetts that some remedy must be found for the wrongs which are practiced under cover of this system, or, unless I greatly mistake the temper of the people, they will demand that the system itself shall be uprooted.

Without detaining the Senate, for I am very anxious to have this bill acted upon, I shall ask unanimous consent to withdraw the pending amendment for the purpose of offering as a separate section the one which I have suggested. I think it will accomplish all the good the pending amendment was intended to accomplish, without encountering the constitutional objections which have been suggested to that proposition. I am not at all sure that those constitutional objections are well founded, but they come from very able lawyers, for whose judgment I have profound respect, and as I desire something that will certainly afford practical relief, even as against existing patents, I prefer the proposed substitute to my original proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks that he have unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment offered by him which is now pending. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINDOM. I will reserve the amendment which I propose in lieu of it until the bill is considered further, and then offer it as a separate section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The first section is open to amendment, as I understand. I have prepared a few amendments to this bill, not in an unfriendly spirit to it, and I should be glad to say a few words about each of them if it suits the pleasure of the Senate. The amendments I have prepared can be read at the end of my remarks.

Mr. COCKRELL. Have the amendments of the Senator from Illinois been printed?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I have them here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have not been offered as yet.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The bill is being considered by sections, and I have prepared one amendment, to which I do not think there is any objection, to the first section. When I have said what I have to say about the bill I will then hand these amendments to the Secretary and he can read the amendment to the first section that is under consideration. I understand the Senator from Minnesota has withdrawn his amendment, and that it is to be presented as a separate section to come in at the end of the bill.

Mr. President, this bill is calculated in many respects to effect a great improvement in the present patent laws, and the report in support of it is very able, and presents many just views on the general subject.

I would like to suggest a few modifications, with the reasons for them. Before doing so, however, I beg leave to observe that there is something to be said on each side of the question between the parties—the patentees on the one side and the public on the other. The grasping spirit of monopoly, the great bane of our social fabric, manifests itself in both. On one side patents have been discovered to be a rich mine in which capitalists can find enormous returns by laying heavy contributions on the community, and combinations are formed for the purpose in which the meritorious inventor has little if any interest. When it affects the community at large, in which each individual has not sufficient interest or power to oppose its schemes, it may be worked successfully for a long series of years, to the great injury of the public.

This lies at the bottom of that system of reissues which has been so greatly abused, and the rule of allowing profits in equity has doubtless been the means of encouraging such combinations.

On the other hand, where patents affect large interests which can easily combine, their concentrated power is sufficient to ruin any patentee who attempts to bring them to account. In each case the strong are enabled unjustly to crush the weak. The general purport of the bill is well calculated to counteract, as far as they can be counteracted, the evils to which I refer.

I will state what I have to say about the particular provisions of the bill by taking up a few of its first sections in the order they are numbered.

Section 1. The first section confines the power of staying proceedings to the court in which the active suit is pending. This power should not be thus limited. The United States is but one jurisdiction; State lines and district lines should not interfere with substantial interests or the general convenience in patent cases. If a suit is fairly litigated in New York the circuit court of Missouri, as well as that of New York, should have the power to stay proceedings on the same patent or claim.

Mr. WADLEIGH. My friend the Senator from Illinois will pardon me, but do I understand him to say that the first section confines the right to stay proceedings to the court in which the causes are pending?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. No, to the court in which the active suit is pending. There must be an active suit pending. My amendment to the first section is to insert as an additional proviso the following:

Provided, however, That if in any suit instituted in any one circuit court of the United States the validity of a patent shall be determined upon final hearing, any other circuit court may recognize said decision, and in its discretion grant injunctions based thereon to continue pending an appeal to the Supreme Court in the first suit; and if the validity of any such patent has been decreed against in a suit instituted in any one circuit court, any other circuit court may in its discretion grant a stay of proceedings in any other suit brought under said patent, pending an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in said first suit.

That is, where there has been a decision anywhere in the United States, when a suit has been commenced on the same patent or claim anywhere else, there need not be any investigation about it at all if the court please. That is the way I read the section.

Mr. WADLEIGH. If my friend will pardon me, the proviso is this:

That where a party, in order to preserve his right of recovery, finds it necessary to institute a number of suits involving the same issues, and he is proceeding with good faith and with reasonable diligence to bring one of them to final judgment, any court in which any of them are pending may, in its discretion, grant a stay of proceedings from time to time in any such other cases pending before it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. That is true, but that is where the party is proceeding to bring them to final judgment. But I wish something further, that is, after there has been a judgment and there has been a decision. I do not interfere with that provision.

EXERCISE OF ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will interrupt the Senator from Illinois, with his permission, to make an announcement. The Vice-President has appointed as the select committee in relation to the violation of the rights of American citizens at the recent elections, under the resolution of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] Mr. TELLER, Mr. CAMERON of Wisconsin, Mr. KIRKWOOD, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. PLUMB, Mr. BAYARD, Mr. WALLACE, Mr. BAILEY, and Mr. GARLAND.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I am very reluctant to decline, but I am compelled to ask the Senate to excuse me from serving on that committee. I dislike very much to refuse to perform any service that may be imposed upon me by the Senate, but the state of the business that I am compelled to look after during the short time I shall remain in the Senate makes it absolutely necessary in justice to myself and in justice to my constituents that I should ask the Senate to excuse me.

In addition to this, there are other reasons, as sickness in my family, which make it improper for me to leave the city at this time. I would not interrupt the proceedings at this time, especially the able speech of the Senator from Illinois, but for the fact that I know it is important that the committee should be made up at an early day; and while I dislike, as I say, very much to do so, I respectfully ask the Senate to excuse me from service on the select committee.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I thought the proper course would be to put the request of the Senator from Oregon to the Senate. That is the reason why I am waiting.

Mr. MITCHELL. This is the first time in the five years I have been here that I have ever asked to be relieved from any duty assigned me by the Senate or any of its committees, and I certainly would not do so now but for the reasons assigned. I am in full sympathy, as a matter of course, with the resolutions of the Senator from Maine and with the investigation, and would be very glad, if it were not for the matters to which I have attracted attention, to give what little aid I might be able to afford to the investigation; but I am compelled to ask the Senate to excuse me, and I hope I shall be excused.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon asks to be excused from serving on the select committee appointed under the resolutions introduced by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] Will the Senate excuse him? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am much obliged.

Mr. PLUMB. It will be quite impossible that I should serve on the special committee for reasons which I need not here detail, but which are of very great weight to me and my constituents. I therefore ask the Senate to excuse me also.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks to be excused from serving on the committee. Will the Senate excuse him? The Chair hears no objection, and he is excused.

The VICE-PRESIDENT subsequently appointed Mr. HOAR in place of Mr. MITCHELL, and Mr. MCMILLAN in place of Mr. PLUMB upon the select committee.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) extending time for joint committee on transfer of Indian Bureau to report; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the printing of 3,000 copies of the reports of Geographical and Geological Survey of the Rocky Mountain Region, being volume 2, Contributions to North American Ethnology, in quarto form; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the printing of 3,000 copies of the report of the Geographical and Geological Survey of the Rocky Mountain Region relating to the geology of the high plateaus of Utah, in quarto form, with the necessary illustrations and charts; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 5532) authorizing the donation of twenty condemned bronze cannon to aid in the erection of a monument to the memory of General George A. Custer, at the Military Academy at West Point;

A bill (H. R. No. 5535) changing the time of holding the terms of the United States circuit court for the district of West Virginia; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 206) providing for the distribution of the Revised Statutes of the United States to the Post-Office Department.

REVISION OF THE PATENT LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, I cannot concede the justice of the second section of the bill as it stands. As it now reads, it would work a complete revolution in the law of profits, and would abrogate entirely any account of profits in a large class of cases which I can hardly think the committee intend to be excluded from such a mode of relief.

First. It abolishes all account of profits, unless the infringer who used an invention realizes a profit from the business he carries on, in which the invention is used. Thus a paper manufacturer may wrongfully use a patented device in his Fourdrinier machine, on which the pulp is distributed and converted into a sheet, which may save him $100 per day; and yet he may manage his business so badly, either in his general manufacture, or in making his sales through commission merchants, or in making injudicious purchases of stocks, or in paying enormous rents for water-power, that at the end of the year he may make no profit at all. To allow the patentee no account of profits for the use of the invention in such a case, because the manufacturer does not on the whole make a profit, is unjust. In the first place it is none of his concern whether the manufacturer's business is profitable or not. He ought not to be compelled, nor ought he to have it in his power to call the latter to an account of his whole business transactions. This is one great evil that was demonstrated in cases where the courts, before the decision in Mowry vs. Whitney, assumed that the whole business should be gone into. I have been told of a case where the entire business of a large sugar refinery, amounting to more than a million of dollars a year, was overhauled for a long series of years, in order to see how much they made in their general business, when the only thing they did in the way of infringement was to use some little contrivance in running off their sugar in the last process. This was unjust, and involved great expense and inquisition into their affairs, which was positively oppressive and tyrannical. And yet in this case, as well as in the case of the paper-mill, which I have supposed, the profit made in using the device infringed was the only criterion of compensation which could be resorted to.

Nothing is more common than cases like this: a manufacturer, say of iron or of cotton or wood, runs his manufactory consciously at a loss or without actual profit for a considerable time. His object is to keep his hands together and his machinery from depreciation until better times shall come. By appropriating the invention of another he runs his works more cheaply though he makes no actual gain. He makes a saving, the only object of most industries, and thus preserves his capital. It is impossible for me to see why this is not just as beneficial to him as would be the use of the invention when business is more prosperous and results in positive additions to the capital invested.

It is only in equity where the infringer is necessarily treated as a trustee, ex maleficio of the property of the complainant, a wrongful appropriator of the patentee's right, that profits are recoverable. Now, why are not savings profits in every sense of the term? The Supreme Court decided that they were in Mowry vs. Whitney, 14 Wallace, 620.

Certainly they are an advantage derived from an unlawful use of another's property when they are the results of the use of another's invention without license. What matters it that the business in which the invention is used has been carried on without actual gain? Is not the infringer better off than he would have been if he had carried on the business without the aid of the property of the patentee? Is he not richer in consequence of his wrongful use of that of which he has unlawfully made himself a trustee? Ought he to be permitted to shift the losses of his business from himself to the person whose right he has invaded? No invention is patentable unless it is useful, unless it can be profitably employed. If profit does not result from its use, the result is due to the fault of him who uses it, to his want of judgment or some cause for which the inventor is not responsible. Ordinarily the world recognizes the justice of holding a trustee ex maleficio liable to account for what he should have made. Is it any answer for a man who has wrapped his talent in a napkin and buried it in the ground when called to account to say, I made no profits? And this, though not a trustee by virtue of his own wrong. If a disseizor takes possession of my house and leases it, can he escape from paying me the rent, though he has failed to collect it or lost it after its collection? In fine, is a trustee in his own wrong ever allowed to retain for himself any advantage he has derived from his wrongful act?

It may be true that the saving effected should not be regarded as an absolute measure of the profit to which the patentee should be entitled. Justice might require that he should recover more or less of the amount. But he ought not to be deprived of all accounts of profits simply because the manufacturer or carrier did not pursue a successful business. The committee is probably correct in saying that the remuneration generally realized by patentees is only from 5 to 10 per cent. of the advantage derived from the use of their invention, a great portion of it being absorbed in the general reduction of price at which the articles produced are afforded to the community. And therefore it may well be that the saving effected by the use of an invention is not in all cases a fair measure of the profits which the inventor ought to receive.

Courts have felt the influence of this when asked to decree against infringers the enormous sums which in some cases have been reported by masters in chancery as profits. But it is equally unjust to deny all account of profits when the infringer makes none in his general business. I am frank to concede that the whole subject of making an infringer account for profits is surrounded with difficulty. No invariable rule of measurement of profits can do justice in all cases any more than an invariable fine or term of imprisonment for crime.

Something like this, applicable to all cases, would, I think, meet the difficulty:

In taking an account of profits for the use of an invention secured by a patent where the patentee or his assignee shall elect to demand profits, the whole, or such portion of the actual profit or saving derived from such use, shall be allowed to the patentee or his assignee, as the court may deem just in order to secure a fair compensation for such use, having regard to what would be a fair royalty therefor in view of the skill exhibited in making such invention and the value thereof to the parties using the same and to all the circumstances of the case; and the master in taking and stating such account, after stating the amount of profit or saving actually made by such use, shall give and state what portion thereof would, in his judgment, be such fair compensation as aforesaid, to be subject, however, to the modification and judgment of the court; but when a patentee or his assignee shall elect to demand an account of profits against any person for an infringement of his patent, he shall not be entitled to recover damages for the same infringement.

I have added the last clause because I never could see any good reason why a complainant electing to go for profits should have damages also.

2. If, however, the Senate should adhere to the principle of disallowing profits where the business of the infringer turns out to be unprofitable, then I would suggest that an account of profits ought not to be confined, as the section now seems to confine it, to cases where the thing patented or the product thereof are manufactured for sale. This would exclude such an account in all cases where the object of the business is to perform service, however profitable. It would exempt from such account all railroad companies, express companies, all construction of houses, and other buildings, bridges, railroads, canals, steamboats, and vessels; all working of mines, mills for custom work, and a thousand other things. Why should not these industries account for profits of an invention used as well as those which are carried on for manufacturing for sale?

Section 3. In order to prevent unreasonable delays, where an appeal is taken from an interlocutory decree establishing the validity of a patent or its infringement, the complainant should be permitted to go on and take his account at his peril, subject to payment of costs and counsel fees, if the decree is reversed, and on giving security therefor.

Section 5. This section, it seems to me, will give a patentee substantially an appeal from one Commissioner to another at any time during the life of the patent. As the law is now, if the Patent Office refuses to allow the applicant any claim which he makes, or to issue the patent in the form which he applies for, he may appeal then and there. It cannot be pretended that there is any inadvertence when he has made a claim which the Commissioner refuses. If he takes the patent without appealing, then he ought to be concluded. But where there has been a real inadvertence, accident, or mistake, he ought to be entitled to reissue to correct it. Never otherwise. This section will open a wide door to get a different patent after witnesses are dead or an examiner has left the office.

I propose now my amendments. The first one in order will be the amendment to the first section which I will have read first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON of Wisconsin.) The amendments will be reported by the Secretary in their order.

The SECRETARY. In the first section, after the words "before it," in the thirteenth line, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, however, That if in any suit instituted in any one circuit court of the United States the validity of a patent shall be determined upon final hearing, any other circuit court may recognize said decision, and in its discretion grant injunctions based thereon to continue pending an appeal to the Supreme Court in the first suit; and if the validity of any such patent has been decreed against in a suit instituted in any one circuit court, any other circuit court may in its discretion grant a stay of proceedings in any other suit brought under said patent, pending an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in said first suit.

In lines 11 and 12 of section 2, it is proposed to strike out the words "for sale or;" and in line 12 insert after the word "selling" the words "or using."

In line 14 of the same section, it is proposed to strike out the words "for sale or," and insert after the word "selling" the words "or using."

It is also proposed to strike out lines 36, 37, 38, 39, and 40 to the word "aforesaid" inclusive, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

In taking an account of profits for the use of an invention secured by a patent, where the patentee or his assignee shall elect to demand profits, the whole or such portion of the actual profit or saving derived from such use shall be allowed to the patentee or his assignee, as the court may deem just in order to secure a fair compensation for such use, having regard to what would be a fair royalty therefor in view of the skill exhibited in making such invention, and the value thereof to the parties using the same and to all the circumstances of the case; and the master in taking and stating such account, after stating the amount of profit or saving actually made by such use, shall give and state what portion thereof would, in his judgment, be such fair compensation as aforesaid, to be subject, however, to the modification and judgment of the court; but when a patentee or his assignee shall elect to demand an account of profits against any person for an infringement of his patent, he shall not be entitled to recover damages for the same infringement.

At the end of section 3 it is proposed to add the following words:

Provided however, Where an appeal is allowed from an interlocutory decree establishing the validity of a patent or its infringement, the complainant shall be permitted to go on and take his account, subject to payment of costs and counsel fees if the decree is reversed and on giving security therefor.

It is further proposed to amend section 5 by striking out in line 31 the words "application or its amendments" and insert in lieu thereof the word "patent."

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, I have some remarks to submit upon some of the questions alluded to in the amendments proposed by the Senator from Illinois, but I shall confine myself, so far as they are concerned, mainly to those offered to the second section on the subject of profits. Before coming to that, however, I have some general views upon the present patent system as a whole, which I wish to submit to the Senate, and in doing so I shall touch many of the points that have already been alluded to.

Mr. President, I have examined the bill presented by the Committee on Patents, and now under consideration with the various amendments proposed by the committee; and though I do not claim to be an expert in the administration of what may properly be called our system of patent laws, I have paid some attention to that system of laws and formed some opinions and arrived at some conclusions upon it; some of which opinions and conclusions are not entirely favorable to all parts of that system as now established by our statutes, nor entirely in harmony with all the expositions and interpretations of those statutes adopted by the courts. And, as these opinions and conclusions relate largely, though by no means exclusively, to matters covered by the provisions of the present bill and amendments, I shall, on the present occasion, discuss the bill only as its provisions may happen to relate to those prominent features of the general system which I propose to consider, except as relates to the second section to which I shall give some special attention.

The Constitution provides that—

Congress shall have power to promote the progress of science and the useful arts, by securing, for limited times, to authors and inventors, the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

This being merely a grant of power, it does not impose upon Congress the duty to exercise the power, unless, and only so far as, its exercise would, in their judgment, promote the public interest. The provision is intended for the benefit of authors and inventors only so far as the securing to them the exclusive right to their writings and discoveries may operate as an encouragement to them to employ their time and their faculties in these fields of mental labor. The public good is the end or object sought to be promoted; the benefit or reward secured to the author or inventor is but the incidental means to that end. And it is only the conviction, that this end or object will be secured or promoted, that can justify Congress in making use of these means. The fact, that a new invention or discovery has been made, should not of itself require a patent to be issued for it, unless such a patent would tend to promote the public good or general welfare; and whether it will have this tendency may depend, not only upon the nature of the invention, but the circumstances and condition of the country and the people, and upon thousands of other facts besides that of the invention or discovery. And if the patent would tend to check and discourage the inventive genius of our people, it would tend to retard, rather than to "promote, the progress of science and the useful arts." And in such a case, unless the invention should be of such magnitude, importance, and utility that its use would clearly contribute to the general good, after paying the inventor for the right to use it more than the injury likely to arise from depriving all the rest of our citizens during the life of the patent, from the right to make and use a similar invention or discovery, which but for the patent they would have had, or to avail themselves of a like principle, then it is, upon the whole, an injury to the public to grant the patent.

Now, I freely admit that, as to the more important inventions and discoveries—those relating, for instance, to steam-power and steam-engines; to the modes and devices for utilizing electricity, such as the electric telegraph; and the more important inventions in the various kinds of machinery used in the leading manufactures, by which the product has been vastly increased and at less expense than by the old methods, thereby opening markets for, and giving value to various kinds of the raw materials produced in our country—I freely admit that, as to all such inventions and discoveries, and many others which I need not enumerate, our patent laws have operated to stimulate the inventive faculties of our people, and by the encouragement they have held out of an adequate reward for the years of patient labor, investigation, and experiment necessary to effect and perfect such inventions and discoveries, have, in these fields of mental labor, placed us in the front rank of nations, if not in advance of all. And to all such inventors and discoverers the nation owes a debt of gratitude; and none should grudge them the compensation, however ample, which the patent laws give them in all they can make from the right to the exclusive use of their inventions for seventeen years. The people, the nation, are greatly benefited and their wealth increased after allowing them the proper compensation for such use. Such inventors and discoverers are the great benefactors, not only of our own people, but of mankind. Their inventions and discoveries have revolutionized the world and advanced the progress of the human race. Their achievements have been the result of patient labor and investigation, prosecuted often under the greatest discouragements and amid alternations of hope and despair, and after the failure of many abortive experiments and disappointments which made the heart sick; but cheered up and beckoned onward by the prospect of bettering the condition of the world as well as their own, they finally triumphed.

For all such inventors and discoverers my admiration, my veneration, and my gratitude are not only voluntary but irrepressible.

But, on the other hand, I am compelled to say, that not even an injunction from a court of equity, nor the more affirmative and forward impulse of a mandamus from a court of law, nor any other process known to gods or men, can make me feel or express a like admiration, or any admiration, veneration, or gratitude, for those men, however numerous and otherwise respectable, whose inventive genius and expansive patriotism have exhausted themselves in the invention of a corn-popper, an improved rolling-pin, a clothes-pin, a wardrobe-hook, a cigar-holder, an improved clasp for a lady's back hair, or for her stocking-supporter or artificial palpitators, nor even of a toy popgun, or a baby-whistle, nor for that more lofty flight of genius which has secured a patent for a mustache guard for keeping a gentleman's mustache out of his tea or coffee, and which could as well be accomplished by shortening the mustache just a little, still leaving it in good working order; nor for the equally beneficent genius who, to save the hens the labor of hatching their eggs, has contrived an incubator to hatch them for her.

Nor is my admiration nor my sympathy greatly excited over the vast amount of brain-power expended by the man who, sitting by a kitchen cook-stove or a dining-room table perhaps, with a piece of wire in his hand, and noticing that a hot plate will burn the naked fingers, happens to think of bending the wire into such form as to lift the plate without burning the fingers, and then straightway applies for and obtains a patent for the invention, to be followed, perhaps, by other patents for improved methods or forms of bending the wire or attaching a handle; nor for the swarm of other equally important patented inventions with which the kitchen of every family is infested and lumbered up, unless they set their faces against all the venders of such patents, as they would against the traveling insurance agents, lightning-rod venders, and organ-grinders who undertake to prowl around their premises.

Many of these insignificant inventions may be convenient enough, if they could be kept always in the convenient spot to be used just when they may each be wanted. But those contrived for the use of the kitchen are so numerous that no ordinary kitchen has room for all of them, and more time and trouble would be spent in selecting each as it is wanted, than would be taken in doing the particular item of work in the old unpatented method.

Mr. President, what I have been saying upon the insignificance of some of the patents which have been granted may seem to be beneath the dignity of the Senate—like mere trifling and a waste of time—but when the Patent Office of the United States will condescend to the granting of patents giving exclusive privileges for such trifles, each of which may become the prolific mother of a brood of lawsuits, I do not think I can justly be charged with trifling when I bring these matters to the attention of the Senate and the country, and ask that some measures should be adopted to get rid of this kind of trifling.

I have no hostility against the Patent Office; I think it has been a useful institution. It is self-supporting also, which cannot be said of any other Government bureau. It has always been administered by faithful, studious, and laborious men, and few idlers have been found there. But much time and labor, I insist, have of late years been spent in the investigation of applications for patents for these trifling matters, which ought to have been promptly rejected, as not, upon the whole, sufficiently useful and important to justify the issuing of patents.

Here, for instance, is a list selected from only a few pages, a small part of the list of patents granted in the year 1876. It does not include one tithe of the equally insignificant, if not ludicrous, patents issued in that year alone:

For a croquet apparatus; mustache-guard for cups; incubator for hatching eggs; protector for studs or sleeve-buttons; weaning-bit for calves; clothes-sprinkler; lamp-wick trimmers; plate-lifter; bustle; corsets, (several patents;) skates, (several patents;) spring-bed-bottoms, (several patents;) corset with pad; croquet-mallet; spring-pillow; stilts; music-leaf turner, (several patents,) all useless, and worse than useless, as there is always a crowd of the opposite sex who are pressing to perform that agreeable labor for the player; toy pop-gun; corn-popper; fly-trap,(several patents;) shawl-bag; candy; pen-holders; wash-basin; suspender end; bell-toy; fire-kindler; tobacco-pipe; playing-cards; lamp-chimney holder; clasp for pocket-book; rolling-pin; step-ladder; machine for forming pop-corn balls; dice-box; cigar-pouch; egg-beater; fastening for sleeve-buttons; suspender loops; support for nursing-bottle; mop-wringers, (several patents;) scissors-sharpener; stud and button; baby-jumper; clasp for bird-cages; book-support; wardrobe-hook; rein-holder; game-counter; game-table; bottle-stopper, (which would be valuable if it always stopped the bottle at the right moment;) toy-pistol; pencil-sharpener; carpet-fastener; stove-lid lifter; tape for hoop-skirts; ironing-board; skirt-supporter; dish-drainer; fence-post; suspender-fastener; tooth-pick; clothes-pounder; eye-glass holder; bow and arrow, (very essential in the present stage of human progress;) pot-cover; shirt-bosom; cork screw; hair-pin; hat and coat hook; toy cap-exploder; coffee-pot; halter; ironing-stand; mop-holder; gate-latch; sad-iron; corset-spring; shirt-protector; shoe-fastener; shirt; gate-hinge; hair-crimper; rolling toy; milk-can cover; toy blow-horn; umbrella-support; corset-steel; carpet-stretcher and tack-driver; glove-fastener; thimble; perch for bird-cage; ladle; lamp-extinguisher; bust-supporter; underwaist; nutmeg-grater; milk-cooler; device for removing wires from bottle-corks; lamp-chimney cleaner; buttonhole-attachment; holder for tumblers; machine for paring, slicing, and coring apples; pantaloons; bottle-washing machine, &c.

I have omitted several which I could not properly mention in the hearing of the galleries, and I have gone over but a few pages of the list granted in a single year. It is safe to say that, in that year alone from one thousand to fifteen hundred patents were granted, as insignificant and useless as those I have given; not one of which, in my opinion, ought ever to have been granted; and to have refused them all would have given to the applicants no just ground to complain of the ingratitude of republics, nor would the progress of civilization have been seriously retarded. It is quite obvious, I think, that if there had been no Patent Office in existence, and the discretion of Congress had been appealed to upon the merits of each case, not one of them would have been granted. I go much further than this, and say that of all the patents for the last ten years, at least three-fourths are utterly worthless, and never would have been granted had they depended upon the judgment and discretion of Congress. But Congress has confided the power of deciding upon such matters to the Patent Office, and such appellate tribunals as they found practicable: and as no human intellect could define in advance all the particular cases or classes of cases in which patents should be granted or refused, they have been compelled to describe by very general language the grounds upon which they might be granted.

The provisions of statute now in force upon this point are as follows, (Revised Statutes, sec. 4886:)

> Any person who has invented or discovered any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement thereof, not known or used by others in this country, and not patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, before his invention or discovery thereof, and not in public use or on sale for more than two years prior to his application, unless the same is proved to have been abandoned, may, upon payment of the fees required by law, and other due proceedings had, obtain a patent therefor.

It will be seen by this that the only discretion left to the Commissioner, if the other requirements of the law are met by the applicant, is the right to decide as to the usefulness of the invention. And by section 4893 the Commissioner, though all the other requisites are shown by the applicant, may refuse it on the ground that it is not "sufficiently useful or important."

It is to be regretted that the Commissioners and examiners have not more liberally exercised this power. The abuses I have mentioned, by the issuing of trivial and unimportant patents, are not more to be attributed to the law than to the mode of its administration. It seems to have been taken for granted that, if the invention or discovery could be rendered useful in any way, a patent ought to be granted. This clearly is not the meaning of the law. There is scarcely anything in nature, patented or unpatented, which may not, on some occasion or in some way, be rendered of some use. Nor should the fact, that an invention may perform some small operation better than it could be performed without it. No patent should be issued, unless the invention contains some new and important principle, not only of some use but of great and general use, and likely to be productive of more benefit to the public, after paying the inventor for its use, than injury to the public by depriving every other citizen of the right to avail himself of his own inventive powers in the same way. This is an age of great activity of thought, and in the light of the public welfare as well as individual rights, it requires or should require a pretty strong case to authorize me to forestall every other citizen of the United States, and put every man's inventive powers in a strait-jacket, as to any part of the field, however small, in which I may happen to have made the first discovery. I ought to be required to show that my invention or discovery is of some magnitude and importance, before I can properly demand that no other person, for the next seventeen years shall have the right of stumbling upon, or by investigation making or availing himself of, a like discovery or invention.

One would naturally suppose, on looking at section 4893 of the present patent laws—giving the Commissioner the right to refuse the issue of a patent, if, in his opinion, it is not "sufficiently useful and important"—that the Commissioner must have been in fault for not liberally using the power. But practically this is not so, or, at least, to the extent that would be supposed. Some of the Commissioners have themselves lamented the abuse. But the practical fact is, that if the decision of the examiner, or (on appeal from him) that of the board of examiners in chief, has been in favor of the patent, the nature and character of the patent is never brought to the attention of the Commissioner, and he never considers, it at all. It is only in the cases where the patent has been refused by his subordinates and an appeal is taken to the Commissioner that the nature of the patent is brought to his attention. In all other cases the practice has been, (and considering the multiplicity of other duties he has to perform, and the immense number of patents issued,) this practice under the present system seems almost, if not quite, unavoidable, that the seventeen thousand or eighteen thousand patents now issued per year are brought to the Commissioner in batches of two hundred, three hundred, or more at a time for his signature.

If he were to stop to look into the nature and propriety of each patent, he would have little or no time to perform any other duties. Thus the very frequency of the abuse takes away the Commissioner's power of correcting it, and the greater the necessity for the correction becomes, the less is his power of correction; and everything is left to clerks and subordinates. And this shows just how much and how little ground there is for the decision of the Supreme Court in the Corn-Planter case, 23 Wall., 181, holding that any question of fraud in obtaining a reissue of a patent is to be regarded as settled by the act of the Commissioner of Patents in granting it. This may be in accordance with the theory of the law which may treat all the acts of his subordinates as his acts; yet the law does recognize the fact, that the examiners and the board of chief examiners have the power to decide, to allow, or disallow an application for a patent, and that the Commissioner can only decide when they may have refused it, and it is brought before him upon appeal. If they allow it, he can refuse it only on the ground that it is not "sufficiently important or useful." As pointed out by the Senator from Minnesota the other day, (in most of whose remarks I fully concur, and to save repetition I adopt,) much of the difficulty arises from the fact that everything in the present system seems to have been contrived for the benefit of the patentee, so as to secure the issue of the patent without reference to the public interest. No one is heard on the part of the Government or the public before these exclusive privileges are granted, while the applicant may be heard almost any number of times; and, though many of these patents may be void, the only remedy of the people is, that each may have the luxury of a lawsuit, which is vastly worse to him than the evil to be remedied. To most men of moderate means, total ruin or quiet submission to the wrong is the only alternative. The whole country, every branch of business, every conceivable thing, is infested with these nuisances, as numerous and annoying as the frogs or the lice of Egypt. No man can do anything or exert his own ingenuity in any direction without danger of running against somebody's patent. If a farmer should break a handle of his plow and go to the forest and cut a natural crook to supply its place, the chances are that he would violate some man's patent, and would be promptly invited into some Federal court to respond in damages, and not only damages but profits.

The increase in the number of patents for the last few years is absolutely astounding. Thus the Commissioner, in his report for 1876, says:

> During the past seven years a larger number of applications for patents were filed and patents granted than during the entire seventy-eight years preceding, reaching back to the enactment of the first patent law.

And the number for that year was seventeen thousand and twenty-six, including, however, one thousand and eighty-one trade-marks. And though most of these patents have served no useful end, like others previously granted, they have lain dormant in the Patent Office, were never introduced into actual use, and have been or will be abandoned by the patentees. Yet it sometimes happens that, among such a host of dormant patents, some will be found which contain some new principle or new mode of applying power which the inventor, however, had failed to render of any use in his own invention. And some other inventor, ignorant that such a principle had been discovered or such mode invented, has made the same invention or discovery, and has had the genius to render it of great practical value, and, as has often happened, got a patent for it, which proves to be valuable: or he may be using his own invention without a patent: when, lo! the patent-sharks among the legal profession, always on the watch for such cases, go to the first patentee and, for a song, procure an assignment of his useless patent, and at once proceed to levy black-mail upon the inventor of the valuable patent, and not only upon him, but upon any man who has ever manufactured or sold, or even used, the later and valuable invention; and hundreds, at least, among the innocent users, choose to compromise rather than run the risk of ruin from lawsuits; and against those who refuse a fertile crop of lawsuits follows, and millions are thus filched and extorted from the people every year.

I am glad to see that the eleventh section of the present bill has provided something in the nature of a remedy against the evils arising from these dormant and unused patents, by requiring a payment into the Patent Office of $50 at the end of four years from the issuing of the patent, and $100 at the end of nine years, in default of which the patent shall be held to have expired. I think these sums ought to be doubled. But as they now are they will help to put an end to most of the useless and dormant patents which have been granted, and to the evils which result from their resuscitation by the Cossacks who follow the army of inventors. I am strongly inclined to the opinion—I will go further, I am convinced by years of observation and reflection—that the granting of patents, in at least three-fourths of the cases in which they have been granted, has tended to suppress rather than to stimulate useful invention in this country.

Take, for instance, those which relate to dress and articles of adornment of both sexes. Every lady is enveloped in patents, from the crown of her head to the soles of her feet, each of which is of as much importance in itself as the patent for a tooth-pick, or a toy popgun; and, though the number with which the dress of our own sex is incumbered is less, their importance is about the same according to their numbers. And as the users of patented articles, as well as the venders and manufacturers, are liable to an action for infringement if the manufacturers of the articles have not obtained the right to use the patent, and neither sex when purchasing thinks of inquiring into the validity of the patents, we are both at all times and constantly walking, incarnate causes of action, and susceptibilities to lawsuits, and, under the modern decisions, trustees, with nothing to protect us from accounting for all the profits, except the fact that it would be hard to show by anything, except expert witnesses, that we have made any: which, however, would not save us from damages, and perhaps treble damages. And we are indebted for our protection from such suits mainly to the fact that public opinion would not tolerate suits for such insignificant trifles. The fact that these various trifles have been, or claimed to be, patented, furnishes a pretext for adding to the price of every article; and millions, and tens of millions of dollars, are paid yearly by the people of the United States in consequence of these trivial, and often ludicrous, patents; when the interest of the manufacturers, tailors and milliners, if their ingenuity were not cramped and confined by these patents, would secure equal and greater improvements. And such is also the fact with respect to the numerous, or rather the innumerable host of patents for trivial inventions in kitchen utensils and those used in dwelling-houses in the ordinary course of domestic uses and economy, as well as in many trifling improvements in farming implements, in gates, gate-hinges and latches, and a thousand other things of like trivial nature. In all these the interest of manufacturers and dealers and open and free competition are better stimulants to invention than our patent laws granting exclusive privileges. And the same is true of many other trivial patents.

I would therefore amend the patent laws so as to take away entirely from the Patent Office and all appellate tribunals, the right to issue any patent for improvements in dress, or articles used with or attached to any part of dress, or for toys of any kind, or any kind of gaming apparatus, or any part or portion thereof. As to the other classes of inventions just mentioned, there is more difficulty, I fear an insuperable difficulty, in defining with sufficient certainty what are too trivial inventions for a patent. But I would require the Commissioner or some other responsible officer, to be appointed for the purpose, in all cases of doubt as to its importance or usefulness to such a degree as to warrant a patent, to refuse such a patent, and to report the case to Congress to be submitted to their judgment and discretion. This would furnish adequate, and I fear the only adequate, security.

I would also limit the power of issuing patents for "new compositions of matter," so as to cut off the right to any patents for medicines or medical compositions or preparations, for use by any human being. In short, I would extinguish all patent medicines. Most of these medicines are got up by quacks, who have no knowledge, or very little knowledge, either of the nature of diseases or of medicines. Some of them may be, and doubtless are, valuable for some particular disease or in some stage of such disease or ailment, and, if taken only under the advice of a physician who has examined the patient and made a diagnosis of his disease, they might prove useful on particular occasions. But they are generally, I may say almost universally, advertised as cures for a great variety of diseases or complaints, for most of which they are generally worse than useless, and often dangerous; and they are mostly taken by those who do not consult a physician, but use the patent medicine, or its advertisement, as a substitute for a physician, until their health is permanently injured, and they are compelled to call the physician at last. And I must declare my conviction, from a long course of observation, that there are yearly nearly half as many deaths in the United States directly or indirectly resulting from the use of patent medicines, as have occurred the present year from the yellow fever. Scientific physicians generally scorn the idea of obtaining patents for medical discoveries; and the emulation among them and their ardor in the pursuit of new discoveries in this line are much safer stimulants to such discoveries than the granting of patents.

There is still a further limitation which I would impose upon the granting of patents for a new composition of matter. I refer to poisons for destroying insects which prey upon and destroy the crops in certain portions of the country, such as the cotton-worm, for example, (and I understand a patent has been granted for a composition of Paris green and some other ingredient for this purpose.) A discovery of this kind would be very deserving of a bounty to be given by the States, or perhaps by the United States. But under the rule of damages, giving all profits which can be shown to have been made by the use of the poisonous composition, and the rule in equity for accounting for such profits, such a patent may be made as great a curse at least, as the worms it was intended to destroy. If it can be shown, for instance—and a corps of experts, who always attend a plaintiff in a patent cause, must have fallen below their ordinary achievements, if they fail to show—that the use of the compound has saved one-third or one-half of the cotton crop of each individual who used it, as probably every planter did; then each may be compelled to pay to the patentee or owner of the patent the one-third or one-half of the value of his cotton crop. This rule of profits this bill, it is true, proposes to restrict; and I am glad it does. But even when this rule shall be restricted as proposed, as applied to most cases, and to such a case as this, I still think no patent should be granted for a composition like this, which, if valuable, is to be used by so many persons, and the cost of which is so insignificant, without fixing by law a rule of recovery measured by a certain percentage on the cost of the materials of the compound. I would say, for instance, 100 or 200 per cent. above its cost. Certainly if Congress were appealed to for a patent in such a special case they would be likely to provide some such restriction as the condition upon which alone they would grant it. And why should they authorize the Patent Office to grant what they would themselves refuse, if their own judgment and discretion were appealed to?

There is still another class of cases in which, for patents hereafter to be issued, to prevent extortion, some rate of compensation should be fixed by the statute, or some more definite means than now exist at law or in equity of determining the amount of compensation for such infringement, when the infringement consists in using the thing patented. They are all that class of cases in which parties engaged in certain occupations or kinds of business, are by law virtually compelled to use the patented invention under most ruinous penalties for neglecting to use it, and in which at the same time, the inventor cannot either at all, or to any considerable extent, get the benefit of his patent by any use he can make of it himself, but must look for his profits to the use of it by others. For example, all who are engaged in manufacturing by machinery propelled by steam, in cities and other localities where conflagrations are peculiarly liable to take place from sparks from their smoke-stacks, are compelled by law by the decisions of the courts everywhere, to avail themselves of the latest and most improved and safest known methods, such as spark-catchers, to prevent the escape of sparks from their smoke-stacks. And if they fail to do so, and a fire takes place from the sparks from their chimney, the neglect to use such spark-catchers or other most improved methods, is held clear, and, in most cases, conclusive evidence of negligence. The same may be said of locomotive smoke-stacks and spark-catchers, and of those on steam-vessels. And the owners of steam-vessels and all railroad companies are also held to the like rule of diligence, and bound to avail themselves of the latest improvements, whether patented or not, for the safety of lives and property intrusted to their care; and if they do not, and life or property is destroyed which might have been saved by the use of any invention or patented improvement, they are held liable.

Now, the inventions and patents applicable to all these cases, for securing the safety of life and property, are very numerous, and if each is not valuable for such purposes it ought never to have been patented. In all these classes of occupations, in all the cases I have mentioned, the proprietor must watch the issue of all the patents, and must resort to the use of the best, which, as a general thing, are the latest, and they dare not neglect their use. The law virtually compels them to use them. They stand between Scylla and Charybdis. On the one hand, stand the owners of these patents in full command of the situation; and, as the law now stands, able to command whatever exorbitant price they may demand for the use of their inventions; on the other hand, the courts compelling them to use these very inventions without regard to cost. The result is that the patentee does not neglect to use the power thus thrown into his hands, and demand the most exorbitant and outrageous price for the privilege of using his inventions. Some submit and pay three, four, five, or even ten times what any just-minded man, or what Congress, if appealed to for the particular patents, would ever hold to be reasonable. Others, feeling compelled to make use of the inventions, and finding they cannot procure the right from the patentee without submitting to such extortions, choose to use the inventions and trust to the justice of courts and juries. Now, in all this class of cases the patent law, as to future patents at least, ought to provide some maximum of compensation for infringement for use. This might be done in various ways, as to manufacturers for using spark-catchers, for example, two, three, four, or five times the cost of material and manufacturing the same; and so for those used on steamers or locomotives. And for those inventions used only on railroads, such as steam-brakes, &c., the above plan might, if necessary, be combined with a ratio of miles of road. There may be many better methods of carrying out the idea of a maximum charge; but that justice and sound policy require some plan to accomplish the object I have mentioned, seems to me quite evident.

Mr. President, I have finished what I have to say of the system in general, and it will be convenient for me, if it will suit the convenience of the Senate, to close whatever remarks I have yet to make to-morrow rather than to-day, as I feel considerably exhausted.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator withdraw that motion for a moment, as I desire to make a suggestion?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I am quite sure that there will not be a quorum of the Senate present to-morrow; at least, that is possible; and it will be desirable for the Senators to know to-night whether a quorum of the Senate expect to proceed with business to-morrow. I move the following resolution:

Ordered, That at twelve o'clock to-morrow the presiding officer adjourn the Senate until Tuesday, January 7, at twelve o'clock meridian.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask if an objection will prevent the consideration of the resolution now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) One objection carries it over to to-morrow under the rules.

Mr. BECK. I do not desire to object unconditionally; but the bill of which I gave notice and which was reported unanimously from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws to-day comes up to-morrow morning and I wish to have it considered before we adjourn for the holidays, for the reasons given by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. EUSTIS,] which show the importance of having it acted upon before the 1st of January when the meetings of the courts occur, who will be embarrassed for the want of jurors.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose that perhaps the Senate will be willing to take up the Senator's bill to-night as nothing will be gained by postponing it until to-morrow.

Mr. BECK. If that can be done, I shall be very glad. I would like to proceed with it now.

Mr. DORSEY. To-day the Senate passed a bill making an appropriation for a deficiency in the Post-Office Department. It is of the highest importance that that bill should become a law before the recess is taken by Congress; and if the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts is adopted declaring an adjournment at twelve o'clock to-morrow, it will be impossible to have that bill signed. I hope, therefore, that the Senator from Massachusetts will withdraw his proposition.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I certainly have no desire to prevent the transaction of legislative business to-morrow if there is to be a quorum of the Senate present so that legislative business can be transacted. I will, with the leave of the Senate, withdraw my resolution informally for the present if the Senate is going into the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts is temporarily withdrawn.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I move that the further consideration of Senate bill No. 300, to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes, be postponed until one o'clock on the 7th day of January next.

Mr. WITHERS. Before that motion is put I beg to offer an amendment to the bill which I ask may be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia offers an amendment to the bill, which will be received informally, and ordered to be printed. What is the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WADLEIGH. My motion is that the further consideration of Senate bill No. 300 be postponed until the 7th day of January next at one o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remind the Senator that the Army bill is fixed for the 8th.

Mr. WADLEIGH. My motion is that this bill to revise the patent laws be made the special order at one o'clock on the 7th of January.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, that the pending bill be made the special order for Tuesday, January 7, 1879.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move that the amendment which I submitted to the bill be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the amendment proposed by myself be printed also.

The motion was agreed to.

BEN HOLLADAY.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I desire to give notice that on the 9th day of January, after the morning business has been gone through with, I will move the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1398) for the relief of Ben Holladay.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. WITHERS, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files the petition and papers relating to the endowment of the Reneau Female University of Mississippi.

EXERCISE OF ELECTIVE FRANCHISE COMMITTEE.

Mr. TELLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee appointed to investigate the recent elections is hereby authorized to employ such clerks and stenographers as may be necessary.

CENSUS OF INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on the taking of the Tenth Census of the United States be instructed to inquire into the advisability of incorporating in such census the following statistics:

First. The total number of persons of Indian blood in the Indian Territory in each tribe.

Second. The number of persons of mixed blood.

Third. The number of persons of full blood.

Fourth. The number of whites who are members of the tribes by marriage or adoption.

Fifth. The number of whites in the Territory who are not members of any of the tribes by marriage or adoption.

Sixth. The number of freedmen in the several nations who are members of the several nations by treaty stipulation or otherwise.

Seventh. The number of freedmen in the several nations who are not members of any of the tribes.

Eighth. The amount of property owned by these several classes of residents in the Indian Territory, and the character of the same.

Ninth. The amount of agricultural products raised in said Territory, and by whom produced.

Tenth. The number of schools, children attending, and cost of the same.

Eleventh. The number and classification of such children, full bloods, mixed bloods, whites, and negroes.

Mr. VOORHEES. I presume there will be no objection to the resolution, merely instructing the Census Committee to make this inquiry.

Mr. MORRILL. I suppose it simply refers to the expediency of this, and is not an absolute instruction.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is all.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and it was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I ask leave to present a petition from the Washington Art Club; and as it is short I desire that it be read, as I propose to introduce a bill in connection with it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be read at length.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The members of the Washington Art Club respectfully represent: It having come to the knowledge of this association through the public prints that in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department great numbers of plates used in the engraving of notes, bills, drafts, bonds, &c., for the Government are being destroyed after having served their purpose, and it being well known that many of these works are of a high degree of merit, and fearing lest these valuable specimens of the engraver's art may become extinct and lost to the world, therefore your petitioners humbly pray that the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to convey or cause to be conveyed to the officers of the Washington Art Club one proof-sheet of each and every such specimen that the Secretary of the Treasury may deem of sufficient merit for preservation among its archives, or that an arrangement be made similar to that existing at the Government Printing Office, by which such engravings, &c., may be lawfully purchased.

THOMAS WILSON,
Vice-President W. A. C.

HENRY L. HILLYER,
Secretary W. A. C.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VOORHEES presented the petition of John C. Landreau for himself and on behalf of his brother Jean Théophile Landreau, praying the interposition of the United States Government to enable him to secure a just settlement of his claim against the Government of Peru for the seizure of large deposits of guano alleged to have been discovered by Jean Théophile Landreau; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of Stephen A. McCarty, of Pulaski, Oswego County, New York, praying for the passage of a law authorizing the President to restore him to his position of lieutenant-commander in the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the petition of John Forbes and others, of Wilmington, New York, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

DATE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. INGALLS. The frequency and great number of the petitions which have been offered like that just presented by the Senator from New York [Mr. KERNAN] in regard to the passage of the bill granting arrears of pensions renders it necessary for me to give notice that at the conclusion of the bill that is in charge of the Senator from New Hampshire, Senate bill No. 300, I shall move the consideration of House bill No. 4234, now upon the table, which is a bill to provide that all pensions on account of death, or wounds received, or disease contracted in the service of the United States during the late war of the rebellion, which have been granted, or which shall hereafter be granted, shall commence from the date of death or discharge from the service of the United States; for the payment of arrears of pensions, and other purposes.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WALLACE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1551) to authorize the payment of certain moneys heretofore appropriated for the construction of locks in the Great Kanawha River, West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VOORHEES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1552) granting a pension to Captain Michael McGrayel; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1553) granting a pension to Leonard Scarbrough; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RANDOLPH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1554) relative to printing impressions from portraits and vignettes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) extending time for Joint Committee on Transfer of Indian Bureau to report was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN SURVEYS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 3,000 copies of the reports of the Geographical and Geological Survey of the Rocky Mountain Region, being volume 2, Contributions to North American Ethnology, in quarto form; 1,500 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 for the use of the Senate, 500 for the use of the survey, and 500 for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 3,000 copies of the report of the Geographical and Geological Survey of the Rocky Mountain Region relating to the geology of the high plateaus of Utah, in quarto form, with the necessary illustrations and charts; 1,500 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives; 500 for the use of the Senate; 500 for the use of the survey, and 500 for the use of the Smithsonian Institution; the illustrations and charts to be made by the Public Printer, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

INDIAN BUREAU TRANSFER COMMITTEE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the Senator withdraw that for a moment?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I wish to call up the resolution that just now came from the House in relation to extending the time for the report of the Committee on the transfer of the Indian Bureau.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That joint resolution has been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I move a reconsideration of the vote by which it was referred.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I ask now that the resolution be taken up and passed.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) extending time for Joint Committee on Transfer of Indian Bureau to report. It extends the time in which the joint committee appointed by the Senate and House of Representatives to consider the transfer of the management of Indian affairs from the Interior to the War Department may report to the 1st day of February, 1879.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Sergeant-at-Arms will close the doors and clear the galleries.

Mr. CONKLING. While the Sergeant-at-Arms is doing that, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 19, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MEMBER SWORN IN.

Mr. ACKLEN. I rise to a question of privilege, and present the credentials of John S. Young, member of Congress elect from the fifth congressional district of the State of Louisiana, to the Forty-fifth Congress, in place of John E. Leonard, deceased. If there be no objection I move the reading of the credentials be waived and the gentleman be now sworn in.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. YOUNG presented himself in front of the Speaker's desk and was sworn in by taking the modified oath.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ACKLEN. I demand the regular order of business, which is the morning hour.

Mr. BRIGHT. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that demand for the regular order until some little business we have here has been gone through with.

Mr. CABELL. It will not take long.

Mr. ACKLEN. I withdraw the demand.

INVESTIGATION OF JUDGE RIVES.

Mr. CABELL. I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration at this time the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it has been represented that Hon. Alexander Rives, judge of the district court of the United States for the western district of Virginia, has awarded a writ of habeas corpus cum causa for the purpose of bringing before him two prisoners, to wit: Burwell Reynolds and Lee Reynolds, in the custody of the officers of the State of Virginia, in Patrick County, one of whom is held under the charge of and for trial upon indictment for murder committed in said county, and the other of whom has been convicted and sentenced for said crime; and

Whereas the said judge has directed the trial of said prisoners to be had before the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Virginia: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the facts connected with said action by said Judge Rives in the cases referred to, and report to this House under what law or authority such action was taken by said judge, and what course, if any, should be taken by this House relative thereto. And said committee, in conducting its investigations, is hereby authorized to call for persons and papers.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. GARFIELD objected.

Mr. CABELL. I hope it will be noted who objected to this resolution.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I rise to a question of privilege. I want to know whether a member of this House is to be menaced in the discharge of his official duty. I understand that the gentleman from Virginia called out in a menacing manner to notice who objected. I claim it is a breach of the House.

Mr. CABELL. I am astonished the gentleman from New York should take any exception to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say to the gentleman from New York that the reporters are bound to note the objection.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Yes.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. It did not alarm anybody.

Mr. CABELL. I neither menaced anybody nor did I intend to menace them. When I intend to menace I will make a demonstration which the gentleman will not mistake.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. What a terrific fellow he is!

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. What did the gentleman mean by that remark?

Mr. CABELL. I wish it put upon the record what gentlemen objected to the resolution, a mere resolution of inquiry.

The SPEAKER. It is a usual proceeding.

Mr. CABELL. I wish it noted who objected to the introduction of a mere resolution of inquiry which I had respectfully presented to the House.

Mr. HALE. There is some little right of objection on this side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair endeavors to protect the rights both of the minority and majority.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. We do not object to the Chair.

Mr. HALE. We do not question the fairness of the Chair at all, but we are not to be frightened by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. We do not object to the gentleman knowing who did object. It is our right to object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels he is here to protect the minority as well as the majority.

Mr. SPARKS. There is no question that the minority has the right to object, and they avail themselves of it very often.

Mr. CABELL. Yes; they have a perfect right to object.

Mr. SPARKS. And they avail themselves of it very freely.

Mr. ACKLEN. I move that the riot act be read. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. If my friend had read it in Louisiana during the last election it would have been better for this side of the House. [Laughter.]

WIDOW OF SEATON GALES.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, presented the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to the widow of Seaton Gales, late an employé of this House, a sum equal to his pay for three months and his proper funeral expenses.

WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. SHELLEY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back the following cases; which were severally referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 5706) for the relief of Samuel I. Gustin, of Georgia;

A bill (H. R. No. 5707) for the relief of Joseph H. Maddox and others;

A bill (H. R. No. 3041) for the relief of Dr. C. E. Tucker, of Putnam County, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 5712) for the relief of Lucinda McGuire, of Memphis, Tennessee;

A bill (H. R. No. 5708) for the relief of James G. Williams; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5709) granting relief to Agnes and Maria de Leon, heirs of Rebecca L. de Leon, for rent of house by United States troops.

PENSIONS TO TEAMSTERS, ETC.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5710) granting pensions to certain teamsters and expressmen of the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

DANIEL SPEAR.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5711) granting a pension to Daniel Spear; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. No. 1244) for the relief of George Williams. I would state to the House that this bill is identical with House bill No. 4412, which was referred to the Committee of Claims, and which that committee has agreed unanimously to report back to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which objections, if any, will be in order.

The bill was read.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. BRIGHT. Yes; there is a report from the Committee of Claims of the House.

Mr. BREWER. I object, and demand the regular order.

Mr. BRIGHT. The bill makes no appropriation. It provides for a commission to ascertain certain facts and to report to the Secretary of War.

Mr. HALE. I would suggest that several gentlemen desire to have a morning hour, and perhaps the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] will let the Indian appropriation bill stand for the present, as we have had no morning hour hitherto for public bills.

Mr. SPARKS. I must insist on the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has advised the Chair that he will not yield for anything, as his object is to have the Indian appropriation bill passed before the holidays.

Mr. BRIGHT. The bill on which I desire to have the action of the House will take but a few moments.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. If the bill is pressed, I call for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BREWER] objects and demands the regular order, and the Chair has no volition.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 104, noes 21.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LIGON in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5534) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following paragraph:

Collecting and subsisting Apaches and other Indians of Arizona and New Mexico: For this amount, to subsist and properly care for the Apache and other Indians in Arizona and New Mexico who have been or may be collected on reservations in New Mexico or Arizona, $320,000.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I offer the following amendment:

After line 1268 add the following:

Provided, That no Indians now living in Arizona or New Mexico or elsewhere outside of the Indian Territory shall be moved into said Territory unless authorized by act of Congress hereafter to be enacted.

Mr. SPARKS. I make the point of order on that amendment. As I understand the amendment it provides for new legislation. In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, it is in conflict with Rule 120.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Mr. Chairman, the point of order, I submit, is not well taken. When the Indian appropriation bill in the last session of the last Congress was in Committee of the Whole my colleague from Texas [Mr. MILLS] offered an amendment similar to this to prevent the Sioux Indians from being removed to the Indian Territory. That amendment was adopted.

Mr. BLOUNT. Was the point of order made on it and discussed?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I find by reference to the RECORD that the amendment was not discussed. On January 27, 1877, my colleague offered this amendment:

And the President of the United States is hereby directed to prohibit the removal of any portion of said Sioux Indians to the Indian Territory unless the same shall be hereafter authorized by act of Congress.

That amendment was adopted by the Committee of the Whole. This, then, is not new legislation, and I submit that the point of order does not obtain. After the Chair has ruled upon it I will beg leave to give my reasons to the House in support of the amendment.

Mr. MILLS. The amendment offered by my colleague does not conflict with the rule. It is germane to the proposition that we are now considering. It does not propose any new legislation, and it does not propose to change existing law.

The Indian Bureau has been constantly attempting to remove the wild Indians from all parts into the Indian Territory, and does so without any authority of law at all, and in violation of treaties which are existing law. Now, then, we offer this amendment to the appropriation bill prohibiting the Indian Bureau from continuing to violate the law by removing Indians into the Indian Territory until it shall be authorized by law. That is all there is about it.

A similar amendment, as my colleague states, was put upon the Indian appropriation bill on my motion in the last Congress without any sort of objection. The Committee on Appropriations agreed to it. There was no point of order made upon it. And, at any rate, I can easily make this amendment in order by simply moving to reduce the appropriation one dollar. In this way that rule of the House has been evaded repeatedly. By moving to cut down the appropriation one dollar we will bring the amendment before the House, and the Committee on Appropriations cannot prevent its consideration. So I think we may as well take this up on its merits at once and consider it.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. It will have been observed that the pending paragraph provides for "collecting and subsisting Apaches and other Indians of Arizona and New Mexico," and for their removal to reservations. Now, sir, we want to prevent these Indians from being moved on to the Indian Territory. We do not object to the appropriation made in this paragraph, but we desire to limit it so that the Indians shall not be removed on to the Indian Territory. We desire this for the reason that already eighteen thousand Indians belonging to the wild tribes have been collected in the Indian Territory on the border of Texas, and we think there are enough of those wild tribes already there to give us trouble; and there is an abundance of territory far removed from the white settlements where Indians can subsist and be collected and taken care of by the Government as well as on this Territory. For that reason we offer the amendment. We think it is germane to the bill. It only seeks to limit the application of the appropriation made, so that the Indians shall not be placed upon the Indian Territory contiguous to Texas.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, the bill does not make provision for settling these Indians upon the Indian Territory, but does make provision in this clause for collecting them upon reservations in New Mexico and Arizona. But these gentlemen desire now to put into this bill a prohibitory clause against the settlement of Indians upon the Indian Territory generally and as an independent proposition. I am not proposing here to settle these Indians nor any others upon the Indian Territory. There is nothing of that sort in the bill; but these gentlemen are so fearful that in future such a thing may occur that they propose to put in a prohibition against it.

Now, I would ask what right anybody has to prohibit the removal and settlement of Indians upon the Indian Territory as an abstract proposition? It is a reservation for Indians, and would seem under ordinary circumstances to be a proper place to settle Indian tribes, but we are not proposing to touch that question here. It would be competent for my friend from Texas, [Mr. THROCKMORTON,] who is on the Committee on Indian Affairs, to bring in a bill prohibiting the settlement of Indians in that Territory, and then the question could be fully discussed, but not here. Sir, this is new legislation attempted to be incorporated upon an appropriation bill, which is in no sense the proper place for it.

The other gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] proposes to reduce the appropriation one dollar with a view of covering the point of Rule 120, making it appear that it reduces expenditures and is therefore within the rule; but the Chair will perceive that this is new legislation and of a grave character attempted to be incorporated into this bill. The time is inopportune and the place improper. I object to it, and as I understand the rules it is not allowable, notwithstanding the amendment interposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to the original amendment.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. One word in answer. I think, sir, that when the gentleman from Illinois takes this section and goes back to page 51 and reads where it says "removal, settlement, subsistence, and support of Indians," and then reads the clause under consideration, he will find that these Indians could be removed from Arizona or New Mexico to the Indian Territory. The clause is as follows:

Collecting and subsisting Apaches and other Indians of Arizona and New Mexico: For this amount, to subsist and properly care for the Apache and other Indians in Arizona and New Mexico who have been or may be collected on reservations in New Mexico or Arizona, $320,000.

Now, if they have been collected there or if they may hereafter be collected there this sum of money is appropriated for their support and subsistence, and also for their removal to wherever the Indian authorities may specify they shall go. The clause in it says that the Indians shall be collected. It does not say that they shall be confined to Arizona or New Mexico, but merely be collected there.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to say a word upon the question of order. That the proposed amendment is new legislation it seems to me no one can doubt. It proposes affirmatively to put upon the statute-book an inhibition against the Indian department removing any Indians from Arizona or New Mexico into the Indian Territory; nor is it germane, and that is a further objection, to the subject-matter of the paragraph sought to be amended. If the Chair will look at the paragraph he will see that this appropriation cannot be expended except, in the first place, upon the Apaches and other Indians who at the time this law comes into force are in the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico. It will be seen further that it can only be used for the purpose of subsisting and properly caring for the Apaches and other Indians in Arizona and New Mexico who have been or may be collected on reservations in New Mexico and Arizona.

It follows, therefore, that this appropriation being by the terms of the paragraph sought to be amended expressly limited by the language employed to the support and care of Indians in the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, the amendment is not germane, and if it were it is not in order.

The question as to whether or not the Government should pursue the policy of locating the Indians in the Indian Territory is one about which people may differ, but it is not proper that it should be discussed upon this question of order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee rose informally; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

A bill (S. No. 1492) to amend section 15 of an act entitled "An act making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1878.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 5501) making appropriation for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1880 and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 210) making an appropriation for the purpose of paying the necessary expenses incurred in investigating the origin and causes of epidemic diseases in the United States.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 5231) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and asked a conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WINDOM, Mr. DORSEY, and Mr. WALLACE conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 5312) making appropriation for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and asked a conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WINDOM, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. WITHERS conferees on the part of the Senate.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union then resumed its session.

Mr. MILLS. I ask my colleague to accept a modification of his amendment which will obviate the point of order. It is to amend the clause by striking out "$320,000," and inserting in lieu thereof "$319,990," and add his proviso.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the opinion of the Chair that the amendment is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. MILLS. Now I desire to address the committee for a few moments. It has been the policy of the Indian Bureau for a number of years to gather up all the wild Indians in the United States and Territories and put them inside of the Indian Territory.

I will not now discuss the great wrong that would be done to the civilized Indians residing in that Territory under treaty stipulations with the United States, by putting all these wild savage uncivilized and almost uncivilizable Indians in contact with them.

I know from conversations that I have had with some of the Cherokees and Chickasaws that they were utterly opposed to bringing these wild Indians in contact with them and the white people surrounding that Territory. It has been asked why will you oppose this thing when there is no law authorizing the Indian Bureau to do it, and they cannot do it without law. We simply know that the Indian Bureau have been constantly doing it in defiance of law and there is only one way of preventing it, and that is by interdicting it. They do it now without law. They do not ask for any authority of law. They take Indians from the reservations in the northern and northwestern Territories and bring them down into a climate to which they are not accustomed in the Indian Territory, and they do it in violation of treaty stipulations and to the detriment of the Indians removed as well as to that of the Indians who reside in the Territory. They brought the Modoc Indians there without authority of law and a great number of them died. They brought the Nez Percés there and some of them, I am told, have already fled and gone back.

Two years ago the Indian Bureau was fatally bent upon gathering the hostile Sioux from along the British border and locating them upon the Indian Territory. They took there a delegation of Sioux chiefs, and if they had consented to remain there in conjunction with the Kiowas, Comanches, and other Indians in that Territory they would have given us war upon all our borders, on the east, north, and south of the Indian Territory. That, however, was prevented by a provision exactly like this which was introduced and supported by myself and colleagues and other representatives of the country near the Indian Territory. We obtained the incorporation in the Indian appropriation bill of an amendment which prevented the Indian Bureau from bringing these hostile Indians down there.

The Indian Bureau is now discussing the feasibility of gathering the Apaches and other Indians in Arizona and New Mexico, those wild dare-devils of the western border, the worst of all the Indians in the United States—of gathering them up and putting them in the Indian Territory. I want the solemn interdiction of Congress, the supreme law-making power of this Government, that the Indian Bureau shall not do this thing until authorized by Congress so to do. They have been doing it heretofore without law, and I want Congress now to prohibit it.

Mr. SPARKS. The trouble with the gentlemen from Texas seems to be that a good part of their State is on the border. It seems that there are some Indians in the neighborhood of their State borders. Now, sir, I cannot help that.

Now, with respect to this proposed amendment, it is well that we should direct attention to the subject-matter before us. The pending paragraph of the bill is a proposition to collect and subsist certain Indians upon their reservations in New Mexico and Arizona, not in the Indian Territory. These gentlemen seem to be anxious to insert some prohibitory legislation against Indians being brought into the Indian Territory, and therefore they have introduced this amendment.

In support of this amendment they refer to the action of two years ago. We then had under consideration the Sioux clause of the Indian appropriation bill, and this is the provision that was then inserted as an amendment, as it seems, by consent of the committee, namely:

> And the President of the United States is directed to prohibit the removal of any portion of the said Sioux Indians to the Indian Territory, unless the same shall be hereafter authorized by act of Congress.

Now, I am willing in this case, and have so stated to the gentleman who offered this amendment, that the same prohibitory clause against the removal of the Apaches to the Indian Territory may be added to this bill. But the gentleman is not satisfied with that. He wants to tie up that Indian Territory against all Indians. His proposition, therefore, is that sort of important new legislation that I object to it here. The proposition of the gentleman may be correct; but the subject is so important that it should be thoroughly considered some time by itself and not here upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. We propose by this amendment that whenever Congress by an act authorizes the removal of Indians into the Indian Territory it shall be done. We do not want the bureau to do it now without authority of Congress.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman says they are willing that the Indians shall be removed to the Indian Territory when there is a law of Congress authorizing it. If there is no such law now, then why is this amendment offered?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. To prevent the Indians from being carried there now.

Mr. SPARKS. The argument of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] is that the Government officials do things now without authority of law and in violation of law. Why, then, pass a new law? Will they not violate a new law just as well as an old one?

Here is this Indian Territory. Indians are upon it—a great many Indians. Some persons insist that it would be well to locate all the Indian tribes upon this Territory. The gentleman from Texas and others in his locality insist otherwise. Sir, this is a very grave question, and one which should be considered in an independent bill, and not tacked on to an appropriation bill.

I have already stated that so far as these Apaches are concerned I am willing, so far as I am individually concerned, to grant these gentlemen the same prohibitory clause that was granted in regard to the Sioux in the bill referred to. But they are not satisfied with that, and they insist that a prohibitory clause shall now be inserted against the removal of any tribes of Indians in the Indian Territory.

Mr. REAGAN. I think that the question raised by this amendment is one that deserves serious consideration by the House. I shall direct the few remarks that I make to the question of the policy of taking Indians from other portions of the United States and locating them on the Indian Territory, west of Arkansas, south of Kansas, and north of Texas.

These Indians occupy a peculiar position. They have their tribal relations and tribal rights. They have their local jurisdiction, but they are not recognized as citizens of the United States. We know that situated as they are they stand as a barrier in the way of the most interesting portions of territory of the whole United States to the advancement of civilization, arresting progress and interrupting the convenience of at least three important States immediately contiguous to that Territory.

The Indians to be located there are wild, roving, nomadic bands of Indians. They do not wish to occupy the soil for cultivation, and they are not likely to reach a condition of civilization at an early period. Now, should it be the policy of the Government to further interrupt the advance in civilization and prosperity of that interesting portion of the country by locating there additional bands of the wildest tribes of Indians?

We appeal to this Congress to enable us to protect at least the States of Kansas, Arkansas, Missouri, and Texas against the location upon our border of additional wild tribes of Indians who could be much better situated with reference to their own convenience, their own hopes and interests, by being located farther out upon the plains where their wild habits would not be interrupted; where they could pursue their vocation of hunting, and of stealing, if you please, (which is an important part of it,) without being brought so immediately in contact with civilized people.

A great number of questions connect themselves with this. We happen to be in a portion of country where large numbers of people recently enfranchised and clothed with all the rights of citizenship have to be educated for the proper performance of the duties of citizenship. We have also to some extent a Mexican population, a little superior to the Indians but not equal to the white men of the United States. These also have to be educated in the knowledge of our system of government. We trust, therefore, that the Government will not permit to be thrown upon us still more of these elements incapable of exercising the political rights of American citizens and not likely to be made capable for a long time, thus creating an additional obstruction to the advancement of civilization in one of the most fertile and inviting portions of the whole country.

Infinitely better would it be for us to shape our policy so that at as early a day as possible, consistently with the rights of the Indians and by their consent, we may bring that Indian Territory into the condition of a Territory of this Union, and prepare it for ultimate admission as a State so soon as its people are sufficiently advanced in civilization, in the knowledge of agriculture and the mechanical arts.

What we want is to arrest the unlawful action of officers of the Government in taking the wild Indians from other portions of the country and placing them upon us as an additional barrier to the prosperity and growth of our country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BOONE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas is an important one, important not only to the civilized Indians who live in this Territory and to the citizens of the States bordering upon the Territory, but infinitely more important to the wild Indians themselves. Without stopping to discuss in my five minutes the question how this measure may affect the civilized Indians and the citizens of the States bordering upon the Indian Territory, I have a word to say in reference to the Indians who are taken from other localities and removed to this Territory.

If gentlemen here did but know the history of the Modocs who were brought from a northern climate down to this Territory, beautiful as the Territory is; if they had seen the havoc which the relentless hand of death has wrought upon that once powerful tribe, I think they would well consider the propriety of absolutely prohibiting the removal of northern Indians at least to a southern climate.

Let me mention another circumstance. During the last summer I believe about two hundred and seventy of the Nez Percé tribe of Indians were brought down and settled in that Territory, professedly for the purpose of preventing Joseph and a number of his band who, as alleged, had been guilty of murder from being hanged, to enable them to escape the vengeance of the law. What was the result upon the Indians thus brought there? Why, sir, it would have been infinitely more merciful to that tribe to have suffered the hangman's rope to strangle Joseph and all alleged to be inculpated in that murder than to suffer the women and children of that tribe to be prostrated, as I have seen them, upon their backs by sickness, finally to die.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPARKS. Is it not a fact that the greater portion of this tribe of Indians died at Fort Leavenworth, or in the Missouri River bottom adjacent thereto?

Mr. BOONE. I am not advised how many died at Fort Leavenworth or thereabouts.

Mr. SPARKS. One other question. Is it not a fact that the diseases from which they are now suffering were contracted there?

Mr. BOONE. I am not so advised.

Mr. SPARKS. I am informed that such is the fact.

Mr. BOONE. I was informed while there that they were the subjects of malarial fever contracted in that Territory and incident to a residence there—a disease which is likely to attack and destroy Indians brought there from a northern climate. I will not undertake to say that the Indians of the north ought not to be quartered upon a territory of their own somewhere in the north, and the Indians of the south upon a territory of their own in the south. That is a question for future consideration. But this I do say—that it is absolute cruelty to the Indian race, wild and savage as they may be, to bring them from the north and put them in that climate.

Talk about exterminating the Indian race! Why, sir, it would be better to put them all to the bayonet and let them die at once rather than subject them to the slow torture of being destroyed by the fevers which infest that Territory. Out of two hundred and seventy, if I am correct in the number, I am informed some seventy or eighty have already died in the short period they have been stationed there. A gentleman near me says the number is eighty-five. If that be true it requires no prophetic pen to see that within the course of a few years that proud man and all his band—I refer to Joseph—will become the victims of disease and death if compelled to remain there. The Indian Bureau or the Interior Department, therefore, ought to be prohibited from removing Indians from a northern to a southern or from a southern to a northern climate at their mere will; and whenever it shall become necessary to settle Indians in any place different from that they previously occupied, it should only be done under an act of Congress.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I come of a stock that was transplanted to the eastern border of the State of Massachusetts. They arrived there in December, and by the 1st of April one-third of the entire body of colonists were in their graves. But we are not dead yet. [Laughter.] We are not exterminated. God's blessing followed the settlement. Therefore I do not draw any particular inference from the fact that some dirty, miserable tribes of Indians sickened and some of them have died in the Indian Territory.

I have been in this House three years, now in the fourth year, and until to-day I have heard but one song from a certain neighborhood as to the beauty, healthfulness, salubrity, and richness of the Indian Territory; that it was too good for the Indians; that the people of the surrounding States ought to be permitted to go into that paradise and enjoy it; that the sooner the Indians died out of it the better. I have learned for the first time this morning it is a great malarial fever bed, and not like the glorious country down in Texas across the line where my friend who makes this motion lives, or the delightful region of Arkansas, or the rich and healthy lands of Missouri, or the lovely country of Kansas, where my friend who stands before me has been able to live, although he comes from the Balkans of Vermont, and must have got a little higher in Kansas than when he started. Now this Indian Territory, we are told, is a great fever bed!

No, Mr. Chairman, the difficulty with this Indian question is that we have never had any settled policy about it. The wise men of the olden time set apart this Territory as a place where the Indians might settle in peace in their progress toward a state of civilization. Their views have been carried out until now. We have a solution of the Indian question in the condition of things in that Territory, and I say unhesitatingly, from my observation as a member of the Indian Committee and the information I have obtained there, when the entire Indian race is in that Territory, under the guns if need be, and I do think it is, of your Army, then five thousand men constantly stationed there will be a sufficient protection for every locality surrounding that Territory. Now, when twenty Indians break out to commit murders we have to send five hundred men, perhaps two thousand, three thousand, four thousand, almost five thousand miles, to fight them.

And let me, say, Mr. Chairman, that the transportation of the Army from one place to another is what costs. Talk to us about the Army! It is because of the expense of transportation it costs so much.

Let me say another thing. They talk about this being a hardship to the surrounding country. Our Texan friends were constantly at war with the Comanches, who raided over the plains, and millions and millions of dollars have been expended to protect Texas against those Comanches when they were wanderers. But we have taken them into the Indian Territory. We have dismounted them. We have disarmed the Comanches, and now a Comanche is no more trouble to Texas than a white man; not the least. Every Indian ought to be taken to that Territory; every Indian ought to be dismounted; every Indian ought to be put under the guns of your Army; and then five thousand men would be adequate to the protection of the country from all danger from this source.

I am not here to blame or to praise the Interior Department for its management of the Indians. My friends in this House know I have believed there ought to be but one head to this matter; that the care of the Indian should be in the War Department. We have got to make an Indian behave himself, and then we will have no trouble with him. I am for making all savages in all parts of the country obey the law. [Laughter.] Yes, that is my feeling about it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HASKELL. I desire to say one word, Mr. Chairman, in regard to the pending amendment which prohibits the location of any more of the wild tribes in the Indian Territory. It is all well enough for the eminent gentleman from New York to tell my people upon the border of that Territory we ought to protect them by five thousand bayonets, but we have stood on the floor of this House begging for an increase of the Army so we might be protected, and while we have stood here begging for it three different forays have been made by these same Indians, thrusting themselves up through our State and marking their way by blood and the burning timbers of the cabins of the settlers on our frontier.

Now, then, the Committee on Appropriations comes in here with a bill providing all the ways and means for gathering these wild tribes from their homes and locating them upon the borders of our State, that when they may become homesick, as the northern Cheyennes did only last summer, they may start northward or westward on a burning, marauding, and murdering trip to their old home. Now we of Kansas, of Texas, and of Arkansas insist that the Indian department, wherever it has located those Indians, shall keep them on the reservations where they now are. It is no part of the heritage of Kansas that she is to be made to border on a cess-pool of Indian outrages, unprotected by any adequate military force, and that our citizens should be allowed to suffer and die by the hand of those red assassins.

Mr. SPARKS. We do no such thing.

Mr. HASKELL. Your bill, whatever may be the pretension of the committee, bars the action of the Indian Bureau in no particular.

Mr. SPARKS. It provides for collecting them in New Mexico.

Mr. HASKELL. It does not provide for collecting them in New Mexico. It simply provides that the Indians now collected shall have so much money. There is not a line in the bill that prevents the Indian Commissioner from removing any Indians from their present locations and locating them anywhere that he chooses.

Mr. SPARKS. Will you allow the language of the bill to be read?

Mr. HASKELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPARKS. It reads thus:

> Collecting and subsisting Apaches and other Indians of Arizona and New Mexico: For this amount, to subsist and properly care for the Apache and other Indians in Arizona and New Mexico who have been or may be collected on reservations in New Mexico or Arizona, $320,000.

Mr. HASKELL. That is merely a description of the Indians, stating where they now are, and if you do not want them moved you can have no objection to the pending amendment, which simply bars the removal in specific terms. Only six months ago a band of these Indians broke away from restraint and murdered our people in our State, and you propose to allow the Indian Bureau to bring there upon those borders the very worst tribe there is on God's footstool and locate them there, and you will allow them to break away and duplicate what has already been done.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FRANKLIN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment meets with my warm approval, and I trust that it will be adopted without delay. The commercial interests of the great States adjoining the Indian Territory as well as justice to the Indian demand its adoption.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] remarked in the commencement of his speech that the difficulty with the gentleman from Texas was that his State happened to be a border State. I apprehend the difficulty with the gentleman from Illinois upon this very question is that his State happens not to be a border State. It is not improbable that if the Indian Territory bordered on Illinois and tended to shut out her commerce from the Gulf or the Atlantic coast he would not be here opposing this measure.

It seems from the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] that he would have us believe that when Indians are placed in the confines of the Indian Territory they are peaceable and quit their warlike habits. I have only time in refutation of this to cite you to the history the Cheyennes made less than twelve months ago in their raid through Kansas, which was marked by blood and rapine and murder? I know it is the object of some gentlemen upon this floor—it seems also to be the object of that portion of this Government which has control particularly of Indian affairs—that this Indian Territory shall be made the abode of all the Indian tribes in the United States. To that, I as the representative of a people who feel a great interest in the future of that country most earnestly demur. Such action would be a serious thrust at the prosperity of the great State I have the honor in part to represent on this floor. We want no more barriers between us and the Gulf, and do not intend to weary in our efforts to tear down those that already exist.

I trust there is a higher future before that country. I hope that the day is not far distant when that Territory will be blessed with the same laws and the same civilization that the rest of the States and the Territories of this country are blessed with. Why do these gentlemen object to this amendment? They say it is unlawful for these Indians to be transferred there; but yet scarcely a year passes but warlike tribes are placed within the limits of that Territory. The Modocs have been placed there; the Nez Percés have been placed there within the last six months. But I suppose gentlemen will rise here and tell us that the Nez Percés are peaceable Indians, friendly Indians. Go ask the settlers of Eastern Oregon and Western Idaho if Chief Joseph and his band are friendly Indians.

Let the Indian Bureau distinctly understand that the Congress of this country is determined that it shall not place any more of these tribes there. The Nez Percés have been placed in the northeastern portion of the Indian Territory.

Article 15 of the treaty of 1868, with the Cherokees, says:

> The United States may settle any civilized Indians, friendly with the Cherokees and adjacent tribes, within the Cherokee country on unoccupied lands east of 96° on such terms as may be agreed upon by any such tribe and the Cherokees, subject to the approval of the President of the United States.

The legislation contained in that article has been violated in many instances.

I can corroborate everything that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BOONE] has said in regard to Chief Joseph's band. I heard his speech before the Senate commission. I have been in his camp within the last two months, and he says he has lost eighty-five of his band since they were settled there. I heard him ask the commission, and he was not answered, "Why does not your Government live up to the agreement it made with me? That agreement," said he, "is constantly before my eyes." He does not desire to remain in the Indian Territory, and claims that the Government in compelling him to stay there is violating a sacred compact.

Why, sir, our dealing with the Indians has been marred by a series of violated agreements and violated treaties. We are told, I forget now by whom or where it is related, that the noted Sioux warrior Red Cloud expressed his want of faith in them during the sitting of the council convened for the purpose of preventing the Powder River war. He refused to sign the treaty, and retiring from the council placed his hand upon his rifle and said, "Upon this and the Great Spirit I trust." This amendment should go further, and if the Indian Bureau has gone contrary to law in placing the Nez Percés in the Indian Territory they should be sent back to some reservation in the same latitude in which they were raised. The country where they now are is not at all suited to their condition and habits of life.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. As one of the Representatives of Missouri, I enter a solemn protest against the admission of any more Indians to this Territory. I see there is a disposition in the minds of some of the Representatives on this floor to have the Indians removed from their States and Territories to other States and Territories. They are acting upon the principle of self-defense. Now, we from the States of Kansas, Texas, Arkansas, Missouri, and other adjoining States, say that we will act upon the same principle and protest against the removal of another Indian to the Indian Territory. Our desire is to have that Territory open to the march of civilization from all the States.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. That is what is the matter.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Why not so open that Territory? The gentleman from New York would not have such a dangerous element as wild Indians located in the limits of his State. Have we not the same right to complain? We want no such neighbors now or hereafter. We prefer their room. I am in favor of opening up that Territory so that all classes of men can go into it and civilize it and make it a resting place and home for white men as well as for Indians.

Mr. SPARKS. Was it not set aside as an Indian Territory?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. This whole country was set aside for the Indians at one time by God, but we have driven them out, and I say let us keep driving them if they stand in the way of the civilization of the country.

Mr. SPARKS. But would you not thereby divert it from the original intention?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Have you not done that with the whole country, from time to time, in years gone by?

Mr. SPARKS. Never mind about that, but answer my question as to this Territory.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I say that it is the intention of this bill to locate the Indians of this country in that Territory, and it will make Kansas, Texas, Missouri, and Arkansas smoking States from one end to the other. We therefore raise our voices against it, and protest against the removal of another Indian to that Territory. It is no idle matter with us.

The people of Missouri, Kansas, Texas, and Arkansas are greatly interested in the subject now under discussion. My constituents are especially interested in it. They want no more wild or semi-civilized Indians encamped within that Territory; no, not one. When there, Mr. Chairman, they stand not only a perpetual menace to the quietude of those surrounding States, to the lives and social happiness of our people, but, sir, they, under the sanction of treaties and law, stand as a Chinese wall around the most fertile and beautiful body of land in our whole country. I am for breaking down that wall. I am for opening up that Territory for the onward march of a greater and more progressive race, that race that now sits before me as the representatives of a free American people.

Congress, on the 26th January, 1877, recognized its power to exclude wild and barbarous Indians from this Territory by the passage of this amendment to the Indian appropriation bill offered by Hon. Mr. MILLS, of Texas:

> And the President of the United States is hereby directed to prohibit the removal of any portion of the Sioux Indians to the Indian Territory unless the same shall be hereafter authorized by Congress.

I am for enlarging this prohibitory power so as to inhibit the removal of any more Indians from any quarter to that Territory. Let us make that Territory what God designed it should be, the home and abiding place of the American citizen. It is now a toll-gate between empire States taxing and oppressing one of the greatest line of railways that enter and pass through Missouri. This should not be the case, and as a Missourian I protest solemnly against it. Ah, some gentlemen on this floor become horrified when I proclaim that I am in favor of removing all barriers to emigration into that Territory. They say you violate a solemn treaty. Too late, now, to assume such honesty after the progenitors of these same gentlemen in years gone by drove the Indians over solemn and broken treaties from Plymouth Rock to the Alleghanies. Let us open that Territory to all races and classes of our citizenship, and this Congress will do its duty to the age in which we live.

Mr. CRAVENS. Before the vote is taken I desire to know where the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] gets his pronunciation of the name of my State.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. From the "Arkansas Traveler." [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAVENS. I presume he has a bad opinion of the people of Arkansas and thinks that they have no rights.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Oh, no; they are all clever fellows.

Mr. CRAVENS. Now, in addition to what the gentleman from Missouri has said in behalf of the civilized tribes, I protest against locating the wild tribes within this Territory. These civilized tribes border immediately upon Arkansas and they have no Representative upon this floor. In their name I protest as well as in the name of the people of Arkansas, Texas, Missouri, and Kansas.

Now, sir, there is a manifest disposition upon the part of the officials of this Government as well as the people of the Territories to transfer the Indians from their borders to the Indian Territory and devolve upon Arkansas, Texas, and other adjoining States their civilization in the future. Sir, let each State and Territory take care of its own Indians.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs informs us in his last report that the white men of Arizona have driven the Pima Indians from their possessions and they propose to transplant them to the Indian Territory. They propose to transplant the Indians from every portion of the country to this Territory.

Now, we are not willing to take upon ourselves this burden. As the gentleman says, we have a Territory there that is inviting to industry, to commerce, and to general progress, and we have advanced the Indians originally located there in civilization until they are prepared now, as I think, to take upon themselves the responsibility of citizenship. And the thing that should be done by this Congress is to territorialize that country, and let each and every State and Territory take care of its own Indians.

Mr. PHILLIPS. This debate on this amendment has taken a very wide range, as it is apt to do when the Indian bill is pending, and most of the remarks have been far from applicable to the subject-matter before us. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] to one circumstance which concerns the whole proposition, the section of the bill reported by him and this amendment proposed to it. I think I understood the gentleman to state or imply that there was existing law for locating these wild Indian tribes in the Indian Territory, as the Executive Departments of the Government have been continually doing.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the fact is that the custom has grown up of locating, in the discretion of the Department, Indian tribes of different characters, wild, nomadic tribes, and some civilized and semi-civilized tribes, in the Indian Territory, but it is done without color of law. The importance of such action to the Indians who are thus removed, to the tribes among whom they are placed and the settlements in the adjoining States, can hardly be estimated.

The proposition in the bill submitted by the committee is to furnish the Department money to carry on this system; a system never authorized by law, which may have some advantages but which has many drawbacks, and which has been attended very recently by terrible crimes and disasters. It is a system which has never been sufficiently digested, which has never been carried on in the proper way to make it safe, useful, and effective, and which may, here and now, well challenge the attention of this House.

As has been stated upon this floor, there are tribes which have subsisted almost entirely by fishing all their lives, which have been taken away from their homes and placed a hundred miles from water, where they are required to begin a new mode of life, under changed conditions, in a climate fatal to them, cooped up on a reservation where they can find neither game nor fish. That they could be expected to thrive and improve under such conditions is out of the question. That they would peaceably remain when too often there is no adequate provision to maintain them is impossible.

The five nations mentioned in the amendment just pending, the Comanches, the Apaches, and other tribes, have been confederated in one nation or have acted as allies in peace and war with the white settlements for more than a century. They have raided upon Texas and the frontier together as one people, a hardy, warlike, restless class of nomads who have never chained themselves to any locality. Like the children of Esau, their hand has been against every man and every man's hand against them, and they have had no abiding-place or home upon the earth. I remember but a few years ago when they used to stop every train on the Santa Fé road in my State and demand the surrender of every Texan. This was after Texas was in the Union. They said they were not at war with the United States, but were at war with Texas. Oh, the bitter border wars carried on by these five nations on the Texas border! It is a long string of bloody raids, a chapter of border horrors I have no desire to drag up. But I do not wonder at Representatives from Texas rising in their seats to protest against such neighbors.

The civilization of the white man was at last too much for them. These tribes fled to Arizona, to the mountains of New Mexico, to the Pacific coast. They have been ranging on that great terra incognita, the valley of the Colorado of the West, and have flitted backward and forward across the borders of our weak neighbor, Mexico, sometimes within the limits of our jurisdiction, sometimes in the other, but never under the jurisdiction of either, and it is now proposed without color of law to bring back those nomadic tribes. Some of them have been settled on reservations where they are, some have been brought to and settled on the Indian Territory proper, near their old roaming ground on the northwestern frontier of Texas. One section of this provides for keeping those brought there where they now are, and this amendment would merely prevent the Secretary or the commissioners from repeating the performance until he was authorized to do so by law. I think, sir, it is high time before such experiments are repeated that we should inquire into its expediency; that we should see that proper steps were taken to protect the settlers against such incursions, and to make these locations, if they are to be made at all, something more than mere crude, unsuccessful, imbecile experiments.

Last season the Sioux, fresh from a bloody war, were brought down into the Indian Territory. It is not for us to inquire how they were treated or what steps the Commissioner took to secure the safety of his unauthorized experiment. The result is before us. They escaped from the charge of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, went through my State, in one day in one county murdered thirty people—men, women, and children; in another day in another county they murdered nearly as many more. I need not harass your feelings with a recital of their fearful crimes. American men and women seeking to make homes in the far West, suffering all the privations and hardships of frontier settlers, seeking by their toil to make the wilderness bud and blossom like the rose, and to make of the wilderness the homes of happy men and women, who were entitled to the protection of the Government; and yet they are left without protection, exposed to these fearful outrages and calamities that the Commissioner may repeat an experiment that has almost always failed and that was never authorized.

I think the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] while perhaps attempting to cover too much is a just provision. I think the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has no right without legislation to take a step so fraught with danger. I think the amendment to compel him to have law in order to authorize his proceeding before he does this thing is a just provision and one worthy the support of this House. This is the place to make it and surely it is time.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to call the attention of the House to the clause of the bill which it is proposed to amend, first to the magnitude of the appropriation contained in it, and secondly to the indefiniteness of the appropriation. The clause is as follows:

> Collecting and subsisting Apaches and other Indians of Arizona and New Mexico: For this amount, to subsist and properly care for the Apache and other Indians in Arizona and New Mexico who have been or may be collected on reservations in New Mexico or Arizona, $320,000.

There is nothing specific in this provision. It is like a great many other provisions of this bill, clothing the Secretary of the Interior with authority to expend at his own discretion a large sum of money. What I say has not the slightest reference to the present incumbent of that office. On the contrary I take great pleasure in saying that I am not aware that any one can make any accusation against him of misappropriating any trust fund placed in his hands as the head of the Department. I speak not of the present incumbent of the office. I say that the whole principle of this bill is wrong; that we ought not to make appropriations except for specific purposes. They should be so well defined and so distinctly declared that there can be no mistake about them.

In regard to the amendment offered by my friend from Texas, [Mr. THROCKMORTON,] I desire to say to this committee that I think there are higher considerations than any with reference to economy merely which ought to guide the minds of this House in determining the propriety of the adoption of such an amendment. I say so because I had occasion last summer to ascertain something about the condition of some of the northern tribes that had been settled in the Indian Territory. I believe the impression upon the mind of every member of that commission, without regard to his preconceived notions upon this question, was that the true policy of the Government, the policy of humanity and justice to the Indians, requires that a northern territory be set aside for occupancy and settlement by those tribes of Indians who were accustomed to northern localities and latitudes.

I know the facts in regard to the tribes referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BOONE,] the Nez Percés and Modocs. They have lost one-half of their number since they were forced into the Territory against their will. Of all the men we saw and with whom we conversed in this investigation, none made so great an impression upon the commission, although he came forward dressed in the blankets and the paints of the Indians, as Chief Joseph. He impressed the commission as a man who understood more thoroughly and perfectly the rights and interests of the Indian race than any other man with whom we came in contact; a man who proved himself with a handful of men a successful opposer upon the field of battle of all the forces of the United States brought against them.

Though we had to take his speech through an interpreter, it showed great breadth of thought and strength of mind. It was analogous to the speech of that great chief of the Sioux, great in all his contact with our people, whether with the military on the field or with our agents in the council chamber. I allude to Spotted Tail. He said very significantly to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs last summer, who told him that he could not, according to the promise of the Government, remove him and his people back, for no money had been appropriated for the purpose—he said to the Commissioner, "Give me the money you would give the white man for the purpose and I will remove myself." And he did so.

There is another question to be considered, the rights and interests of the civilized tribes who already occupy this Indian Territory. You talk about taking their territory as if it belonged to the United States, as if it had not been pledged to the Indians by the most solemn act of the Government. Whenever you undertake to remove a savage tribe of Indians and settle them in the Indian Territory you should first obtain the assent of the Indians already there.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLOUNT. The portion of the bill now under consideration does not refer to the removal of tribes of Indians to the Indian Territory. The title of this portion of the bill is "Removal, settlement, subsistence, and support of Indians." Whenever in the succeeding paragraphs a removal is designed, it is specifically stated. It is so estimated for and generally so incorporated in the bill itself. Therefore there is no removal of Indians to the Indian Territory contemplated by this paragraph.

The pending amendment proposes to prevent hereafter the removal of any Indians to the Indian Territory. Why? Gentlemen in one part of the House give as a reason that it is improper to bring northern tribes into this Territory where they are exposed to disease, death, and annihilation. On the other hand, another gentleman from that same section of the country announces that he desires that the Indians shall be kept out of the Territory in order that room may be made for white men. I guess that is very nearly the truth in relation to this whole matter. If these Indians were removed from the Territory, I think my friend from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] would be down there directly.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Yes, if there was any money to be made there.

Mr. BLOUNT. No doubt of it. But in the interest of the white race, and of my friend especially, I want to keep the whites out of there and preserve their lives. You find here all these conflicting views in regard to this Indian Territory. The truth is that the finest lands in this country are there, and they are a temptation to the enterprise and the intelligence of the country which is seeking to make its way there.

This Territory was set apart for this particular purpose years ago. Why should we abandon it? It is true that the occupation of this Territory by the Indians may be inconvenient to adjacent communities; but the nearness of these Indians would be inconvenient to communities elsewhere, and I know of no proposition to take these Indians to a place where the land is better, where they may hope to become civilized, where they may cultivate the arts of peace. This Territory seems to be the last refuge for them; and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CRITTENDEN] indicates much of the spirit of the opposition to locating the Indians there when he declares, "I desire their removal to make way for the white man." This has been the rule in reference to the Indians from the very beginning to the present time. After what we have taken from them, it is but meet that we should pause to consider something of their rights.

Mr. Chairman, I trust that in this way this change will not be made. I assume that the executive department of the Government has better opportunities than we have to reach mature and just conclusions as to the interests of the Government and the people of this country. I assume that the Government in setting apart this Territory hitherto has considered the matter carefully. It has now been set aside for years; and I trust that the policy in reference to the Indian Territory and the Indians is not to be changed here upon an appropriation bill in the midst of conflicting views, none of which can with confidence be asserted to be entirely correct.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, although this debate hardly seems to be apropos to anything in the bill, yet for my part I am very glad that it has arisen and I am especially glad that it has produced the open declaration on the part of gentlemen from Missouri and Arkansas as to their purposes in regard to this Indian Territory. I am very thankful that one gentleman from Missouri has brought up to our minds one instance of the bad faith of the United States in matters of treaty. Yet under the guise of "the march of civilization" another gentleman from Missouri proposes to violate at least thirty solemn treaties of the United States with the parties who are now in possession and occupancy of the Indian Territory.

It is well for the country to know that under these terms "march of civilization" there is now proposed and being pressed before committees and before this House a proposition to violate all these treaties—a proposition that the United States with the consideration of the treaty in its coffers—a consideration which it will not and cannot return—shall violate those treaties and open that Territory to the "march" of a "civilization" which signalizes itself by violating all the principles of equity and of honor.

I am glad at least to see that there is grace enough left in this matter to sugar it over with pleasant phraseology. I am glad to see that no member of this House makes a proposition to take land away from people who own it unless he can convince his mind that the handsome phrase, "the march of civilization" will cover the occasion as well as the country in question. I hope that this Congress will take notice of the proceedings which are going on in this direction, and will not allow itself under any guise to further and assist them in any fashion.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the proposed amendment—not because I desire the Indian Territory thrown open to white settlement. So far as I know no feeling of that kind exists in my own State. Neither do I favor the amendment because the transfer of northern Indians to the Indian Territory will result in the death of many of them.

The best wild Indian I ever saw was a dead one. I am in favor of the proposition because it is essential to the protection of the white people in adjoining States, especially my own State. Those Indians cannot be transferred from their homes in that northern climate into the Indian Territory and be satisfied and contented. They will break away whenever they can; and it would take an army of ten thousand or twenty thousand men to make the white settlers in adjoining States absolutely secure in their homes.

The Indians are liable to break away at a time when there is the least apprehension of danger, as in the case last summer when a band of Cheyenne Indians, dissatisfied with their new homes in the Territory, broke away and crossed my own State, marking their path with the blood of men, women and children. The Indian character is not well understood——

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow one to ask him a question?

Mr. RYAN. I have not much time, and I think the gentleman ought not to interrupt me.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Is not the gentleman informed that the reason those Indians broke away was because the northern Cheyenne and Arapahoes had not a dollar of money appropriated for their subsistence by the last Congress?

Mr. RYAN. I understand that the band to which I refer broke away without any provocation under heaven except that they were dissatisfied with their new home. There was no other provocation than that they wanted to get back to their former habitation; and on their way they gave vent to that feeling toward the white people which characterizes the wild Indians. I have said that the Indian character is not well understood. That is a fact. That Indian, in his savage state, is the greatest idol of his tribe who can dash out the brains of the most children; ravish the most women, and then murder them; kill, by the most cruel torture, the most men, and then adorn his belt with the scalps of all.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I notice in looking over this bill that the appropriation falls a fraction short of $5,000,000. I am told the Indian population of this country is about two hundred and fifty thousand; it may be two hundred and sixty thousand or two hundred and seventy thousand. According to this state of facts you appropriate, then, about $20 a head to every man, woman, and child of the Indian population in North America.

A MEMBER. And the white Indian gets nothing.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, sir; the white Indian does not get anything. I propose, however, that something should be done for the white as well as for the red Indian. [Laughter.]

It may be answered there should be $5,000,000 appropriated; so much as applies to treaties is well enough, but that for the support of the Indian population is another matter. It may, I say, possibly be answered, but how much of that $20 a head does the Indian man, woman, or child receive? A friend near me suggests it may be ten cents; another eleven cents. [Laughter.] I will venture to say, Mr. Chairman, that out of that $20 per capita when you have deducted the pay of agents, interpreters, squaw-men, and other expenses, there will be but a small balance left. I venture to say out of the $20 per capita not $3 a head go to the Indian man, woman, or child.

Mr. FINLEY. How much goes to the thieves?

Mr. WRIGHT. If I enumerated the stealings there would be nothing left for the Indians. "Lo" would not have enough left to buy himself a pair of moccasins or a belt of wampum.

Mr. HASKELL. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly, you may.

Mr. HASKELL. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania wish to bring the "Mollie Maguires" down to the Indian Territory? [Laughter.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I propose to have honest government; and I would not let your agents and interpreters and squaw-men go on as they have gone. I would have these fellows outside and those inside and those in sympathy with them treated as we have treated the "Mollie Maguires," and that is hang them by the neck. That is the way I would dispose of that subject. I do not think the time has come in this country to appropriate $5,000,000 for this subject, notwithstanding it is recommended by my honorable friend from the State of Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] who always does what he thinks is right, but he has committed an error of judgment if he thinks in recommending $5,000,000 to be appropriated as it is here he is doing what is right.

Mr. SPARKS. We do not appropriate $5,000,000.

Mr. WRIGHT. It lacks only a little of it. It is four million nine hundred odd-thousand dollars.

Mr. SPARKS. Only $4,700,000.

Mr. WRIGHT. It does not fall much short of $5,000 000, as I have already stated.

I do not stand here, Mr. Chairman, to-day to encourage the persecution of the Indian tribes. God knows, coming from the section of country I represent, I would, if I followed the inclinations of the men who lived there before me, be in favor of pursuing the line of persecution. That day, however, has gone by. I am willing to do what is right between the red man and the white man. The white man has many rights in this Government which we pass by with indifference and neglect. Let us look to the comforts of the poor white man, as well as the red; adjust your rule to one of universal rights. We vote $5,000,000 to the Indian; when shall it be recorded upon the Journal of this House that $5,000,000 has been appropriated to relieve the sufferings of our poor white people.

But, sir, when we appropriate vast sums of money to the red man I do not want the white man, the official white man, to steal three-fourths of it. [Laughter.] That is the difficulty in regard to this whole matter. There is an army of interpreters, traveling agents, squaw-men, speculators, and——

A MEMBER. Teamsters.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand the gentleman to say seamstresses. What else?

Mr. SPARKS. You want seamstresses, do you not?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes; if they would only sew up your mouth to prevent advocating this wild expenditure they would do the State some service and help the Treasury from a serious draft upon it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPARKS. Go on, I apologize. [Laughter.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Apologize for what? I have not examined whether this appropriation is an increase over the appropriation of last year or not.

Mr. CLYMER. It is a decrease.

Mr. WRIGHT. How much?

Mr. CLYMER. Some $400.

Mr. WRIGHT. Four hundred dollars decrease over last year! Astonishing! I would make the decrease in the appropriation as four to one, and instead of making $5,000,000 I would make it $1,000,000. I would fulfill treaty stipulations strictly, but I would not pay interpreters, agents, and squaw-men, who eat out the substance of these poor fellows and become rich at the further degradation of the Indian race.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, when the historian comes to write an impartial history of the conduct of this great Government and its people toward the Indians, it will be a history of perfidy and wrong which ought to bring the blush to the face of every honest citizen of this Republic. The Indians of this country less than three hundred years ago were the owners of more than three millions of square miles, and there are now only seventy thousand square miles of land in the Indian Territory, which, by treaties almost without number, have been dedicated to them as their home for all future time. And yet we are told that the march of civilization must roll its wheels over this small remnant of territory and crush the Indians forever out of existence. Let gentlemen be manly; if they want to play the thief, let them play it openly and in a manly way.

For my part I undertake to say, Mr. Chairman, that the very reason why we are compelled to spend $4,700,000 for the support of these Indians is largely in consequence of the fact that they are permitted to be scattered over one-half of the territory we possess. Settle these Indians in this Indian Territory, put the guns of the soldier over them to keep the peace, and you will be able to reduce the expenses for the Indians one-half, and in addition reduce the expenditures for the transportation of the Army and supplies more than one-half.

We pay, Mr. Chairman, this year for supporting and clothing two hundred and fifty thousand Indians $4,710,000. We pay this very same year for transporting army supplies, provisions, and clothing for twenty-five thousand privates and twenty-two hundred officers $4,000,000. And yet when it costs to carry the provisions and clothing for twenty-seven thousand of the Army $4,000,000, men talk about the want of economy in managing the Indian Bureau. You will save one-half or two-thirds of this sum if you will comply with solemn treaty stipulations, put the Indians on the reservation, and keep them there, where they will be under the control of the Army and under the influence of civilization.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I cannot concur in the opposition which is made to the gathering together of the Indian tribes within the Indian Territory or within other portions of the Government domain that may be set apart for that purpose. While the State I represent, like Missouri and Kansas and other States, borders upon the Indian Territory, yet I am convinced that the policy which will gather together the Indians from off the great number of great and small reservations which they inhabit and place them upon a few is the only practical and safe and honest solution of the Indian problem. In the State which I represent we have some four thousand Indians occupying a territory comprising twelve millions of acres of land. We feel, as does every other Representative within whose State or Territory Indians may be colonized, that they must be removed to the different reservations and placed somewhere else. Where are they to be placed? The Indian Territory, while it borders upon various States, is not within the limits of any of those States. It does not interfere with their government or with their civil polity. It may to a certain extent threaten or menace the property or the persons of their citizens; but wherever we place the Indians, wherever they are found, there you will find the property and the persons of the white people of the country threatened.

There must be a policy for the control of the Indians. It is a problem to which the minds of the best and the greatest men of this country have been turned; and I think the conclusion that is rapidly being reached is that if you would civilize the Indian, if you would make him partially harmless, if you would elevate his condition and at the same time protect the property and the persons of the white people, this policy of scattering them all over the western and northern portions of the continent upon small patches of ground, requiring the Army to be divided into innumerable bands for the purpose of giving even a semblance of protection, must be abandoned and the Indians must be gathered together upon three or four or five reservations in some parts of the country where they may be protected, and where good conduct on their part can also be enforced.

Why, Mr. Chairman, what is to become of the Indian? I do not indorse the sentiment that the best Indian is the dead Indian. He must have a foothold and receive protection. And unless reservations are set apart for him speedily what will be the result? As we go forward in the march of civilization Indians upon their reservations meet us in every Territory and in every State. The cry arises, they must get out of the way, they must abandon the land that they own; and once more the Army or the treaty is brought into requisition for the purpose of pushing them to the west or the north or the south to make room for the white people of the land. There must be some policy, and I suppose the policy of placing them upon a few reservations is the only true and Christian and humane policy that can ever be inaugurated or enforced.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ATKINS. I think the House is ready to vote. I offer what I send to the desk as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. THROCKMORTON.]

The Clerk read as follows:

And the President of the United States is hereby directed to prohibit the removal of any portion of said tribes of Indians to the Indian Territory unless the same shall be hereafter authorized by act of Congress.

Mr. ATKINS. I think there will be no objection to that amendment on any side.

Mr. PAGE. Let the original amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$320,000" and insert "$319,990," and add these words:

Provided, That no Indians now living in Arizona or New Mexico, or elsewhere outside of the Indian Territory, shall be moved into said Territory unless authorized by act of Congress hereafter to be enacted.

Mr. PAGE. I do not see any difference between the substitute and the original amendment.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I rise to say that I am willing to accept the substitute, and before I sit down I desire to answer a remark made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] simply to set myself right as the mover of this amendment. I for one, as my friend from New York well knows, have opposed all the time the opening up of the Indian Territory for the settlement of white men. I have had no such motive in view; nor has the delegation from Texas had any such view; nor has the delegation from Kansas, as I am informed, had any such view. But I desire to say for the information of the House that this Indian Territory bounds Texas one hundred and twenty miles on the south, and one hundred and fifty miles on the west. It lies in that position to our State and to that portion of our State which is most rapidly settling; and there are but two United States posts anywhere in that region of country. They are two hundred miles apart on that border, and it is three hundred miles from the northern post at Fort Elliot to the nearest post in the southern portion of Texas, so that for all this long distance of our border they can at any time make forays upon our people.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I am happy to bear witness to the truly kindly spirit with which my friend who has just taken his seat has always approached the Indian question. The feelings he has manifested on that subject do honor to his head and to his heart. I do not in the least, in intimating that there are those who want to have the march of civilization run over the Indian Territory, include my friend from Texas. I think he feels on that subject as I do.

I want to say one thing further. I have been informed by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs—I have not made the computation, but I know it must be so—that of the enormous sums to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] referred contained in the Indian appropriation bill largely more than half are simply for paying the interest on the purchase-money on lands which we have bought from time to time from the Indians. We are simply paying the annuities by way of interest on the debt we owe the Indians, so that appropriations for the Indians do not come in the shape intimated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

I want to say one word to the gentlemen from Kansas because they know very well why I sympathize with the State of Kansas. If the Government could have the Indians within the sweep of a moderate-sized army there would be no outbreaks from the Indian Territory, but when our Army is scattered over a territory half as large as the continent of Europe, while you have to bring five hundred men to fight one hundred Indians, the Army will be ineffective, and it is found utterly impossible to keep the Indians in check. I say in the interest of the people of Kansas that if they are to be protected from Indians you have got to bring the Indians within such a compass that the Army can control them and then set the Army to control them. I do not agree with the gentleman from Kansas that the best Indian is a dead Indian. We have Indians in the State of New York, whole tribes of them, that are as peaceable as any citizens we have.

My own property in the State of Kansas lies right upon an Indian reservation, and I know that the Indians do as little injury and make as little trouble as white men, and are just as inoffensive. Sir, an Indian is like anybody else; if he is left alone in a savage state as a savage he is a most disagreeable animal; but if he is civilized, taken from his pony and set to work, he is as good as any one.

Mr. RYAN. But these Indians are in a savage state.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Then use the Army to make them behave themselves.

Mr. SPARKS. The substitute of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] is satisfactory to me so far as I am individually concerned, and it has been known to these gentlemen for an hour at least that it was satisfactory, and that is all I have to say. I hope the committee will now vote on the proposition.

Mr. BLOUNT. Before the gentleman takes his seat will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPARKS. Very well.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand that this direction to the President relates simply to the Apaches and other Indians in Arizona and New Mexico.

Mr. SPARKS. Only.

Mr. BLOUNT. Other gentlemen differed with me and I wanted that understood.

Mr. MILLS. I do not see how they could have understood it otherwise.

Mr. BLOUNT. But they did.

Mr. SPARKS. I suggested to the gentleman who moved the original amendment that if he would confine it to those tribes of Indians I was satisfied; and I understand he has done it.

The question was taken on the substitute offered by Mr. ATKINS; and on a division there were—ayes 71, noes 60.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, and Mr. ATKINS were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 77, noes 61.

No further count being called for, the amendment offered by Mr. ATKINS was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I give notice that I shall ask for a vote upon that amendment in the House.

Mr. SPARKS. Of course the gentleman will have a right to a vote on it in the House.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read as follows:

For the support of the Tonkawa Indians, at Fort Griffin, Texas, $2,000.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I have an amendment to offer, to come in after that clause, which I think the committee will agree to:

Provided, That the same shall be expended under the direction of the commanding officer at Fort Griffin.

Mr. SPARKS. I discover that that is the law of the last Congress, and I have no objection to the amendment at all.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read as follows:

Transportation of Indian supplies:

For this amount, for necessary expenses of transportation of such goods, provisions, and other articles, for the various tribes of Indians provided for by this act, $225,000.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I offer the following amendment to come in at the close of that paragraph:

Provided, however, That in the payment of any installment of any annuity to any tribe of Indians named in this bill, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to retain from said installment any and all amounts that may be found to be due, as ascertained under the act of May 29, 1872, in pursuance of the rules and regulations adopted by the Secretary of the Interior, to any person or persons on account of the wrong act of the tribe committing said wrong act; and said amount so retained shall be paid to the person or persons who may have suffered loss by said wrong-doing.

Mr. SPARKS. I make the point of order on that amendment. If I understand the proposition, it is a change of existing law and moreover is not germane to this clause.

Mr. LUTTRELL. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois who has charge of the bill, I wish to say this much: the law provides that if any white man shall go upon any Indian reservation and commit any depredation he is not only subject to civil process, but criminal prosecution. It also provides that Indians or tribes shall be held responsible for depredations committed outside of their reservations.

I ask the Clerk to read section 14 of the act of 1802.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That if any Indian or Indians belonging to any tribe in amity with the United States shall come over or cross the said boundary line into any State or Territory inhabited by citizens of the United States and there take, steal, or destroy, any horse, horses, or other property belonging to any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, or of either of the territorial districts of the United States, or shall commit any murder, violence, or outrage upon any such citizen or inhabitant, it shall be the duty of such citizen or inhabitant, his representative, attorney, or agent, to make application to the superintendent or such other person as the President of the United States shall authorize for that purpose, who upon being furnished with the necessary documents and proofs shall, under the direction or instruction of the President of the United States, make application to the nation or tribe to which such Indian or Indians shall belong for satisfaction; and if such nation or tribe shall neglect or refuse to make satisfaction in a reasonable time, not exceeding twelve months, then it shall be the duty of such superintendent or other person authorized as aforesaid to make return of his doings to the President of the United States and forward to him all the documents and proofs in the case, that such further steps may be taken as shall be proper to obtain satisfaction for the injury; and, in the mean time, in respect to the property so taken, stolen, or destroyed, the United States guarantee to the party injured an eventual indemnification: Provided always, That if such injured party, his representative, attorney, or agent shall, in any way, violate any of the provisions of this act by seeking or attempting to obtain private satisfaction or revenge by crossing over the line on any of the Indian lands he shall forfeit all claim upon the United States for such indemnification: And provided also, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the legal apprehension or arresting within the limits of any State or district, or of any Indian having so offended: And provided further, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to deduct such sum or sums as shall be paid for the property taken, stolen, or destroyed by any such Indian out of the annual stipend which the United States are bound to pay to the tribe to which such Indian shall belong.

Mr. LUTTRELL. The law of 1834 and the law of 1872 also agree with that just read, that the parties who have had property destroyed by the Indians shall be indemnified. I believe it to be justice that the Indians shall be protected; and it is but justice that the white man shall be protected as well as the Indian. I have offered my amendment in good faith.

Mr. SPARKS. I hope the Chair will rule upon the point of order.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. One word on the point of order.

Mr. SPARKS. I do not think the gentleman from California seriously thinks——

Mr. LUTTRELL. The gentleman from Illinois has no right to think for the "gentleman from California."

Mr. SPARKS. I do not want to think for the gentleman from California; but I want to complete my sentence. I hardly think the gentleman from California thinks that his amendment is in order.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. SPARKS. That the amendment offered is not germane to the bill and is in violation of existing law.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I wish to address myself to that point of order. The gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] has had read the law of 1802. That law has been changed several times. The law of 1802 provided that where Indians in treaty with the United States committed depredations such spoliations, after being ascertained, should be deducted from their annuities. Afterward the law was changed and the Government of the United States was made liable to pay out of the Treasury of the United States for the depredations committed by the Indians. That law was again changed in 1872.

The law specified that claims for depredations should not be paid until authorized by an act of Congress. The act of 1872 went still further and provided that it should be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to prescribe rules and regulations for the ascertainment of all damages that Indians in treaty with the Government might have inflicted upon the property of white people; and vice versa if white people had depredated upon the Indians that should also be ascertained; and when ascertained under the rules and regulations prescribed by the Interior Department it was to be reported to Congress, and no claim for such depredation could be paid until an appropriation for the purpose was made by Congress. The amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] does not seek to change any existing law. If I understood it aright it proposes that when a claim for depredations has been ascertained as prescribed by law and by the regulations adopted by the Interior Department, the same shall be deducted from the annuities due the Indian tribe or tribes that may have committed the depredation.

One word further. This is not an increase of expenditure; it does not add one dollar to the appropriation, and only provides that where these claims have been ascertained as provided by law——

Mr. SPARKS. It is not sufficient that it shall not increase the appropriation; it must reduce the appropriation to be in order.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. There are now pending before the Committee of Claims and the Committee on Indian Affairs claims to the amount of over $4,000,000 for depredations committed by Indians in treaty with the Government of the United States. The amount of the claims has been ascertained, but there is no remedy unless Congress will make an appropriation to pay them. I see no better way to make such an appropriation than to provide, as this amendment proposes, that the amount shall be deducted from the annuities due to the tribes that committed the depredations.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I desire to be heard upon the point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. One point of order is already pending.

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point of order that more than two speeches on a point of order is out of order.

Mr. SPARKS. I ask a decision of the Chair on my point of order.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Where so strange a point of order is made as that just made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] as a matter of course he will give his authority for it. His ipse dixit is hardly sufficient to set aside a well-settled practice of the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I have offered no ipse dixit. The gentleman is very gratuitous in his remarks; he had better be more careful.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I did not mean it in any offensive sense at all.

Mr. ATKINS. It is offensive.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I insist that "ipse dixit" is not offensive. [Laughter.]

Mr. ATKINS. I insist that not more than two speeches can be made upon a point of order. Two speeches have already been made upon the pending point of order, and I insist upon my point of order.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I want to answer the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair does not propose to establish any new practice in the House. The Chair has noticed that on several occasions the presiding officer has allowed debate upon points of order.

Mr. ATKINS. I know it has been done. But this bill is being delayed by discussions on points of order and that sort of thing until there is danger we will not get it through to-day.

Mr. SPARKS. I insist upon a ruling upon my point of order.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I ask to be heard before the ruling is made. In any event, I have a right to speak upon the new point of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

The CHAIRMAN. The recollection of the Chair is that there is no but eoal right upon the part of the gentleman to continue the discussion upon the point of order; it has rather been in the discretion of the Chair that discussion is allowed upon points of order. If the matter is pressed upon the present occupant of the chair, he will have to hold that debate upon the pending point of order is closed.

Mr. SPARKS. I insist that debate shall be closed upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The opinion of the Chair is that the point of order is well taken by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I have no interest in this point of order one way or the other, but during my five or six years' service here I have never known the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole or the Speaker to fail to hear any member upon a point of order; and in view of my own interests and the rights of all members, I want to know whether that practice is in accordance with the rules. If not, then it is within the power of any member now and then to cut off other members absolutely from exercising this right which is certainly sanctioned by long usage. I never knew the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole or the Speaker to refuse to hear any member upon a point of order and to hear him fully.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I would like to make one suggestion.

Mr. SPARKS. I ask that the Clerk proceed to read.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I simply ask for my right on this floor, and in doing so I ask for the right of every other member, not interfering at all with any right which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] may possess. I do not think that it lies within the province of a gentleman representing the Committee on Appropriations to apply the gag law to any member of this House.

Mr. SPARKS. I insist that the Clerk shall read.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. And I respectfully ask the Chair to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated that, according to his understanding of the practice of the House, it is discretionary with the Chair to hear or not hear discussion upon a point of order. Of course the present occupant of the chair does not wish to adopt any new ruling; nor does he mean any disrespect toward any gentleman who may want to discuss this question further; but the Chair being pressed for a decision, two speeches having been made upon the subject, would like to hear from gentlemen who have been in the House a longer time what has been the custom—whether this discretion is lodged with the Chair or not.

Mr. GARFIELD. As I understand it this is a matter usually allowed to be regulated by the discretion of the presiding officer. Whenever he wants to hear further discussion on a point of order it is usually allowed. But as a strict matter of rule the proceedings on a point of order are summary; and, beyond the right of a member to state his point of order, there can be no debate except by unanimous consent.

Mr. ATKINS. If the Chair desires to hear further discussion on the point of order, I make no objection.

Mr. CLYMER. The Chair has decided the point of order.

Mr. SPARKS. I understand that the Chair has passed upon the point of order.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Will the Chair permit me to make a suggestion before he finally passes upon the point?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already passed upon the point of order.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I do not wish to discuss the point of order, but to make a suggestion to the Chair in connection with the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] As a matter of course we all recognize that discussion upon a point of order may be stopped at any time by the Chair—that is, whenever the Chair feels that he has been sufficiently enlightened on the point of order to make a decision, then he may say "I want to hear nothing more upon the question." If the Chair in this case has arrived at a frame of mind which satisfies him absolutely beyond a doubt that he knows all about this point of order and every question connected with it, then he may rightfully exercise his prerogative and say "Discussion must cease." If this is not the frame of mind of the Chair, then I insist that gentlemen have a right to be heard further upon the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will resume the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Incidental expenses of Indian service in California: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service, support and civilization of Indians at the Round Valley, Hoopa Valley, Tule River, and Mission agencies, and pay of employés at same agencies, $35,000.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read the following:

Provided, That no part of said sum shall be used for any other payment to employés at Round Valley reservation than that of salaries of physicians and surgeons, the salaries of teachers, and for school purposes: and no more than $3,000 of this appropriation shall be used for this purpose.

I want to say that last year——

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Will the Chair hear me? I propose in this case to limit the expenditure on that reservation——.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I make the point of order that this amendment embraces new legislation and is not in the line of retrenchment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Now, if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] will listen to a statement which I make from sworn testimony that I have here, I think he will not object to the amendment. Last year an appropriation of $15,000, I believe, was made——

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. If the gentleman is going into the discussion of that testimony on this point of order I must object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California will confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I am prepared to prove that of the money appropriated for Indians upon the Round Valley reservation last year more than two-thirds were stolen from the Indians and went into the pockets of employés. In proof of this statement I have here the testimony of Hon. G. W. Henly and others, taken before the Indian commission.

Now, this amendment is in the line of economy; it is in the line of equity, justice, and honesty; and if the gentleman from Indiana means to be honest, or means that his party shall be honest, let him not oppose this proposition for the protection of the Indians, and I appeal to democratic members to stand by the Indians.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. If the gentleman charges fraud, let him go before the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department and prove it.

Mr. LUTTRELL. The gentleman having charge of this bill [Mr. SPARKS] proposes a modification of my amendment. The object of the amendment is to prevent men in charge of that reservation from robbing the Indians.

Mr. SPARKS. That is what I want.

Mr. LUTTRELL. In reply to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] as regards fraud, we expect nothing from the Committee on Indian Affairs. These facts, the frauds, are before him and still he heeds them not.

If the gentleman will allow the Clerk to read what I send up, it will satisfy every member in the House that the proposition I make is the correct one—made in the interest of the Government and for the benefit of the Indian.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I say the evidence should not be read; it is not on the point of order.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I offer it on the point of order.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Let the gentleman go before the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department and make his charge, and let it be investigated, instead of standing up here and howling about fraud. [Laughter.]

Mr. LUTTRELL. I am not howling about fraud, but the gentlemen on the other side of the House have stood up here and allowed, from one end of the land to the other, the hard earnings of honest men to go to corporations and monopolies while they would shield the rings that plundered the poor Indian. Talk about howling; you are the last man that should speak of howling. I charge on the testimony here that this amendment offered is strictly in the line of economy.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I insist this discussion shall stop.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the point of order is well taken.

The Clerk read as follows:

Incidental expenses of Indian service in Colorado: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service and pay of employés, $4,000.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move to strike out the last word. I do so for the purpose of getting in the testimony.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to appropriating one dollar unless that money shall go in good faith, as it is intended, to the Indian and not to the speculator. To show you how the money is expended at Round Valley Indian reservation annually under the present management, I ask to have read an extract from the testimony taken before the commission.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I make the point of order; it is not germane to the last word and therefore not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to have read what he sends up as part of his remarks.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Of course I have. The gentleman is very sensitive—very thin-skinned.

The Clerk read as follows:

List of employés at Round Valley Indian reservation, with their salaries, from July 1, 1877, to July 1, 1878.

Agent	$1,500 00
Physician	1,200 00
Farmer	1,000 00
Blacksmith	1,000 00
Clerk	1,000 00
Miller (grist)	1,000 00
Sawyer (saw-mill)	900 00
Hop-raiser	900 00
Teacher	800 00
Herdsman	800 00
Assistant teacher	700 00
Hospital steward	700 00
Total	11,500 00

Amount of appropriation		$16,500 00
Amount paid to employés	$11,500 00
Amount paid for provisions and clothing for Indians, agricultural implements, &c.	5,000 00
	16,500 00

Mr. LUTTRELL. You find of $16,000 appropriated for the Round Valley reservation $11,000 went to employés, hop-raiser, farmer, and others, while the Indians did not get $5,000 all told. But that is in keeping with the general policy of the administration. There is no necessity for such expenditures for employés. This man, Mr. Hayt, has that report in his office, and he knows full well, if he is fit for anything, that it ought not to be so. I propose that this appropriation shall conform to what is necessary to carry on the reservation. Still further to show what they have allowed this year and how money is being spent there, I will have another extract read from the testimony. But the gentleman objects to this. He stands up as a republican and objects to economy, objects to honest government for the poor Indian, and says frontiersmen are not the friends of the Indian. Now, sir, we are better friends than the gentleman or any of his kind. I ask that the extract be read; and I will here add that this expenditure and management is only in keeping with the management of other reservations.

The Clerk read as follows:

List of employés at the Round Valley Indian reservation, with their salaries, from July 1, 1878.

H. B. Sheldon, agent	$1,500 00
S. J. Reid, physician	1,000 00
I. W. Adams, clerk	900 00
Philo Handy, farmer	840 00
G. B. Hopper, blacksmith	840 00
C. M. Brown, sawyer	840 00
N. S. Fanning, miller, (temporarily)	720 00
D. B. Cummings, teacher	720 00
J. G. Short, hop-raiser	720 00
J. W. Vann, herdsman	600 00
Bowman, (at saw-mill)	840 00
	9,520 00

Mr. LUTTRELL. That is in keeping with the whole management of these Indian reservations. After the payment of employés there is nothing left for the Indian. When I come to ask that the Indians shall have the money appropriated for their support, gentlemen on the other side object, and they say we shall not go on with retrenchment and reform. Oh, yes, the gentleman from Indiana says he is in favor of these poor Indians, but at the same time he stands up in defense of the policy which plunders the Indians. He stands up in defense of it and objects to any amendment excluding unnecessary employés. I am a friend of the Indian; and I tell you to-day he is being robbed and plundered throughout this broad land, and when he is driven from his reservation by hunger, because he is being robbed by thieving rings, he goes out and makes war upon the frontier settler. And yet we have no relief, and the gentleman defends the policy which will continue this plunder of the poor Indian.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, all I ask is this: that whatever money is appropriated by Congress shall go for the benefit of the Indian. And I further state that the Indians on the Round Valley reservation are as good farm-hands and teamsters as you will find anywhere. They have fine tracts of land; they have all the natural advantages that mortal man can desire upon this earth; and the only thing they have to contend with is this horde of employés who are eating them out of house and home.

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announcing concurrence in a resolution to print 10,000 copies of Professor Hayden's twelfth annual report of the Geological and Geographical Survey of the Territories for 1878.

It further announced concurrence in a resolution to print 3,000 copies each of volumes 3, 8, and 13 of the final reports of the Geological and Geographical Survey of the Territories, in quarto form, with the necessary illustrations, with amendments in which concurrence was requested.

It further announced the passage of the following bills without amendment:

A bill (H. R. No. 5682) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for transportation of the mails by railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5683) to amend an act approved June 20, 1878, and to fix the rate of interest on bonds authorized by said act to be issued by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. SPARKS. I hope the committee will now vote on the amendment unless the gentleman from California withdraws it.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I withdraw it.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following paragraph:

Incidental expenses of Indian service in New Mexico:

For general incidental expenses of the Indian service, support, and civilization of Indians at Abiquiu, Pueblo, and Mescalero agencies, and pay of employés at same agencies, $20,000.

Mr. SPARKS. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out the word "Abiquiu."

This is an agency which has already been dispensed with.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following paragraph:

Incidental expenses of Indian service in Wyoming:

For general incidental expenses of the Indian service and pay of employés, $2,000.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move to strike out the last word. I do so for the purpose of saying that for the truth of every word I have uttered in the last few minutes in relation to the management of Indians in my district, for the truth of every word I have uttered on this subject, I refer to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER,] to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BOONE,] to Senator SAUNDERS, and other gentlemen who were there and took this testimony and know every word of it to be true. And I now say that I never again can or will cast my vote for an appropriation for Indian supplies until there is honest government and honest management in that department. Never, under any circumstances, will I vote another appropriation for Indians until their management is taken out of the hands of the Interior Department and placed in the hands of the War Department where it justly belongs. The blood of thousands cries out from the very earth all over this broad land for justice. Those Indians talk just as Captain Jack did, before he was executed, when he left the lava beds, "rather than stay on that reservation and starve, I would choose a speedy death," and therefore he went to war. The Indians have been driven from their reservations by the land sharks and rings who have been plundering the Indians all over the West. I never will vote a dollar for the Indians until I know that it will be properly applied for their support and education. I never will vote a dollar for the Indians unless they are held responsible for the depredations committed on frontier settlers, as provided by the law of 1802 and subsequent acts.

We on the frontier feel this keenly. Our brothers, our neighbors, our families, are murdered in cold blood by those Indians who are driven from the reservations by starvation; and I for one will never vote another dollar until justice shall be meted out to the poor Indian. Nor will I vote for another dollar for the support of the present Indian policy until the Government protects the frontier settlers against Indian raids and indemnifies them for property destroyed.

Mr. SPARKS. I hope we will now have a vote on the amendment.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I withdraw it.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Expenses of Indian commissioners: For the expenses of the commission of citizens serving without compensation, appointed by the President under the provisions of the fourth section of the act of April 10, 1869, $15,000.

Mr. SCALES. I move that the paragraph just read be stricken out. In order that the House may know what the merits of this amendment are, I ask the Clerk to read the law by which the commission was appointed, and I will then show some of the duties they have to perform.

The Clerk read as follows:

And for the purpose of enabling the President to execute the powers conferred by this act he is hereby authorized, at his discretion, to organize a board of commissioners, to consist of not more than ten persons, to be selected by him from men eminent for their intelligence and philanthropy, to serve without pecuniary compensation, who may, under his direction, exercise joint control with the Secretary of the Interior over the disbursement of the appropriations made by this act or any part thereof that the President may designate; and to pay the necessary expenses of transportation, subsistence, and clerk hire of said commissioners while actually engaged in said service, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. SCALES. Now, Mr. Chairman, I understand the object of that law was to appoint ten gentlemen noted for their philanthropy and intelligence who should have equal power with the Secretary of the Interior in disbursing the Indian fund. It seems to me that there is no necessity for that any longer, if what the Indian Bureau claims for itself is now true. They claim in their opposition to the transfer of this bureau to the War Department that the Indian Bureau of itself is sufficient to carry out all the purposes of the law and to perform all the duties devolving upon this department honestly and successfully without calling to its aid this outside force at an expense of $15,000 per annum. These gentlemen are appointed for the purpose, as the law says, of aiding the Secretary of the Interior in doing what he says himself he can do. It is said that they have no compensation. Fifteen thousand dollars are appropriated annually for the expenses of this commission, and yet they do nothing, they supervise nothing that cannot now already be done, and well done, if the present officers will do their duty. I turn to the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and I find that he sums up the duties of these commissioners to be as follows: the contracts shall be advertised and the bids when received shall be deposited, publicly, in a box, locked and sealed, made especially for the purpose, and—

At the proper time said box is opened in the presence of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the purchasing committee of the board of Indian commissioners, representatives of the Interior Department, (these latter being designated by the honorable Secretary of the Interior,) and the usual large assemblage of interested persons who attend the annual letting of contracts for the Indian service.

Now, sir, is there any propriety in paying them and their clerks $15,000 for this service? The opening is done, as we are told, in the presence of the Indian Commissioner, in the presence of persons appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and in the presence usually of a very large assemblage who are interested in these matters. Why, then, are these men superadded to do what can be done, and ought to be done, and as well done by other officers? Then, again, we do not need them as inspectors, because gentlemen by referring to the bill will see that a sufficient number of inspectors is provided for. They are men I hope of intelligence and philanthropy, and I hope men of integrity and skill, whose business it is to inspect all the goods purchased for the Indians before and after the purchase. These men can be made to do their duty thoroughly and well, and if they fail put in others. We need not then pay this $15,000 annually to these commissioners for this purpose. It is true now and then they charter a palace car and make an excursion over the Indian country, visit the agents, and talk a little with the Indians, and as a general thing are pleased with their progress and civilization. Their expenses are all paid, they have a good time, and they return in good humor with everybody and everything.

Sir, all this can be done by the inspectors who are sworn and sent out for the purpose, and can be done much better and to a better purpose. I invite the attention of the House to the proposition. I say let us cut down this machinery; let us simplify it; let the Secretary of the Interior take this work and be responsible for it; let the Commissioner of Indian Affairs do his whole duty and the inspectors do their duty, and if they are honest and skillful men it cannot be necessary to get outsiders to help them—men who take no oath, who give no bonds, and who have no responsibility; men who are only bound to duty in the language of the law by their intelligence and philanthropy. I hope the clause will be stricken out.

Mr. CONGER. I think the country understands that one of the greatest improvements in the Indian service, one that promotes not only honesty in purchase but economy to the Government and value of purchase to the Indians, has been effected by the appointment of this board of Indian commissioners, and more good has been done in that direction since their appointment than perhaps could have been done by any other process. That is the general opinion of the people of the United States who have examined into this subject and of the press throughout the country.

Now, I know that those who sell goods for the Indians, the traders, do not desire this commission to remain in existence any longer. It has been a wonderful check upon the swindling both of the United States and of the Indians. This board give their services voluntarily. They are selected from known, reputable, and honorable gentlemen in different parts of the United States. They are selected with special reference to the duties they have to discharge: one of them and another of them with reference to their knowledge of the kinds of goods to be purchased for the Indians; one is familiar with clothing, another with hardware, another with another branch of the purchases of supplies for the Indians. I have the honor of being well acquainted with one member of this board from my own State, and I have met and conversed with other members of the board.

I find they perform this duty because they may be useful to the Government and useful to the Indian service at a great disadvantage to themselves and at a sacrifice of their time and business, but they do it as other patriotic citizens perform duties to their Government and country. I have no doubt from the examination I have given the subject that there has been a saving to the Government of the United States of hundreds of thousands of dollars in the purchase of Indian goods and supplies, and not only that but the goods and supplies purchased under this arrangement have been sent to the Indians, and these commissioners have put such checks upon those who furnish the goods that they must send the kind and quality of goods purchased to the Indians themselves.

We might, sir, if this last, best, most beneficial check upon fraud in the purchase of supplies for the Indians is removed, give up the system entirely. It has prevented the frauds of which a few years ago such complaints were made, and justly made, in regard to the swindling both of the United States and the Indians. I think any gentleman acquainted with the different members of the board of Indian commissioners will be well aware, as I believe I am, that their services, rendered gratuitously to the United States, have been of very great value both to the Government and the Indians themselves.

I read the names of these commissioners and their distribution throughout the United States, and I ask any gentleman here to say if any one of them is unworthy the confidence of the House and of the country: General Clinton B. Fisk, New York; William Stickney, District of Columbia; A. C. Barstow, Rhode Island; David H. Jerome, Michigan.

A more honorable, a more trustworthy and faithful man than Mr. Jerome, I know of my own personal knowledge, does not exist in this country.

Mr. SCALES. Nobody disputes the question as to the character of these gentlemen.

Mr. CONGER. Ay, but the charge is against these gentlemen, against their integrity, their usefulness, or else the board should not be removed.

Mr. SCALES. Against their usefulness their utility only.

Mr. CONGER. E. M. Kingsley, New York; John D. Lang, Maine; B. Bush Roberts, Maryland; W. H. Lyon, New York City; E. N. Stebbins, New Jersey.

Now, that is the list of these gentlemen. I have the honor of being acquainted with three or four of these gentlemen somewhat intimately, and although the gentleman now admits their integrity, admits their usefulness, admits the great value of their services both to the Government and to the Indians, yet for the sake of saving $15,000 he proposes to dispense with their services.

Mr. SCALES. I did no such thing, and the gentleman ought not to misrepresent me. I admitted that they were men of good character, but that was as far as I went.

Mr. CONGER. Nobody denies that, and it was a gratuitous admission. The very motion which the gentleman made assails their usefulness, assails their character, because if they be good men, if they be useful as we claim, they save to the Government at an expense of only $15,000, hundreds and thousands of dollars in the purchase of goods for the Indians, and save at least half the value of the purchases to the Indians.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move to strike out the last word. I am glad the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. SCALES] has brought this amendment to the attention of the Committee of the Whole. I do not wish in the remarks I shall make to reflect for one moment on the character of the eminent gentlemen comprising this peace commission. I think the original purpose of employing them and placing them as a sort of balance-wheel on this particular Department of the Government was a good one; that is it was a very well-meant experiment. But I also say that it was an experiment unheard of in government. I hold in the first place that one head is better than half a dozen for executive business. I also hold that none but responsible officials, men who are appointed, who can be paid and removed, ought to be intrusted with its responsibilities. I say that practically it has done nothing but work mischief and destroy all power to fix responsibility or insure the performance of systematic duty from those to whom we assign duties so important. I say to gentlemen here what the gentleman from Illinois in charge of this bill [Mr. SPARKS] must admit, that the only way to secure efficiency in any government is to give due power to the executive officers and then fix upon them responsibility for the proper exercise of those powers. I am not yet prepared to admit that no honest and capable officials can be had, and if I was driven to such conviction I would be loath to fall back on such a cumbrous experiment.

I wish to say that it is an experiment which we could never for one moment introduce into any other Department of the Government. Suppose there should be fraud, or weakness, or mismanagement in the Post-Office Department, or in the War Office, or in the Navy Department, would we undertake to hedge about the executive officers of those Departments by means of boards of eminent merchants and gentlemen who are not responsible, who receive no pay, who perform duty when they please or neglect to perform it when they please, who are here to-day and away to-morrow? No, sir; the true way is to place the responsibility of Government upon the executive officers of the Government. If you place the responsibility in the hands of such boards you will have an end of all responsibility. It was a crude, well-meaning idea, originally obtruded in a theoretical and philanthropic spirit, but diametrically opposed to the genius of our institutions and which should never have been adopted and ought now to end.

Let me give a single instance. Some years ago when certain supplies were to be purchased a dispatch was sent to one of the members of this board who was in a western city. He had no opportunity to examine the estimates; he had no opportunity to examine the supplies; but he affixed his signature to a paper authorizing a purchase which he did not and could not understand.

I say that however well-meaning this experiment is it is a most unheard-of expedient in Government. It is an experiment which never should have been tried, and I thank the gentleman from North Carolina, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, for bringing the proposition for the repeal of this commission before this Committee of the Whole. His amendment I understand has the sanction of the Indian Committee, which ought to know more of these matters than the Committee of Appropriations. I understand they have had a laborious investigation into the whole system of Indian management and that one of their conclusions is that the interests of the public service require us to sweep away this highly respectable convocation of barnacles. It is true they get no salary and we merely spend $15,000 a year in paying their expenses traveling around. With all due respect to them, I think we can properly economize that amount. If the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is incompetent or untrustworthy, or should ever prove so, we possibly might induce another one to take it. If he needs eight or ten respectable gentlemen to watch him, who is to watch the eight or ten respectable gentlemen? And so we might go on multiplying these checks and balances until Government was like "the wheel within a wheel, and the wheel within a wheel" spoken of by the rapt prophet. I think it high time that there should be an end of this well-meaning but worse than useless expedient.

Mr. BOONE. I suppose that no gentleman on this floor or elsewhere would seek to attack the reputation or standing of either of the gentlemen spoken of by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.] But because they are high-toned, honorable gentlemen, I do not see that that of itself furnishes a reason why the Government of the United States should expend $15,000 a year in order to tack them on as a sort of fifth wheel to the Interior Department or the Indian Bureau for the purpose of securing a just administration of affairs in that Department or bureau.

Now, as very properly remarked by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] if the Interior Department is capable of managing the Indian question, if the interests of the Government and of the Indians are subserved in that Department, then we have in it all the machinery necessary to perform every duty that pertains to that management. Then why is it necessary to take on an outside party, without bonds, not under oath, responsible to nobody, to assist the Interior Department in purchasing and judging of the qualities of the goods purchased for the Indian service.

As has been remarked, this is a curious machine; it is an anomaly in government. Here is a Department charged with the management of Indian affairs. We have three inspectors provided for by law, who are paid annual salaries and whose duty it is to inspect the quality of goods purchased. But we are gravely told now that they are incompetent to discharge that duty, and it is necessary that eight or ten gentlemen, without connection with the Interior Department, shall be employed to discharge that duty for them. If that be true, then abolish your three inspectors to whom you pay I believe about $3,000 a year each.

If your inspectors are competent to perform their duty, then remove this outside wheel which is an incumbrance upon that which is already a cumbrous machine. I am told that they receive nothing whatever for their services. That is true; but it seems to be necessary that we shall expend $15,000 a year for their expenses in order that they may have the privilege of making little trips and taking excursions. It amounts to nothing more than that, because, as I before remarked, if these inspectors do their duty this board is simply an incumbrance on the machine.

Mr. SPARKS. Does the gentleman say that the Indian inspectors under the law inspect the goods that are purchased?

Mr. BOONE. I suppose so.

Mr. SPARKS. They do not inspect goods; they inspect agencies.

Mr. BOONE. Then I am misinformed upon the subject.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman is.

Mr. BOONE. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] is laboring under a mistake when he makes that statement.

Mr. SPARKS. I am not in error at all.

Mr. BOONE. I do not yield any further. I will read what the Commissioner of Indian Affairs says upon that subject:

> The bids are then taken from said boxes, one at a time, and read publicly by the Commissioner or members of the board of Indian commissioners; thence they are passed to clerks to be numbered, recorded, and abstracted, after which the officers named, with the abstracts of bids and the samples before them, (said samples being divested of all marks that could reveal ownership, and having already been subjected to the scrutiny and examination of reputable and competent inspectors, experts selected for their technical knowledge of the various kinds of goods offered, appointed for the purpose after the bids are opened,) make the awards of contract.

Mr. SPARKS. "Examination of reputable and competent inspectors." They are not the three inspectors of which the gentleman is speaking.

Mr. BOONE. Who are they?

Mr. SPARKS. They are Army officers and others.

Mr. BOONE. Very well. I understand that Army officers are sometimes called upon to discharge the duty of the Interior Department in inspecting these goods, and I very well understand the necessity for it. But whether they be Army officers or Indian inspectors, the fact remains the same, that after undergoing the scrutiny of the inspectors appointed by law, this other outside party, responsible to nobody, must take supervision and pass a second judgment on these goods. I object; and I protest in the name of the people of this country who pay the taxes that they ought not to be subjected to the payment of such an unnecessary tax as this, small as the amount may seem.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPARKS. I regret that these gentlemen representing the Committee on Indian Affairs should feel called upon to make such a war upon the annual Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. BOONE. If the gentleman will allow me a moment——

Mr. SPARKS. I do not yield to the gentleman; he had not the courtesy to yield to me; and I want to show him that I have as many rights on this floor as he has.

Mr. BOONE. I have equally as many rights as the gentleman. And I did yield.

Mr. SPARKS. As I was saying, I regret that the members of this committee should feel called upon to make attacks now upon clauses of this bill, similar ones to these having been before this House year after year for four years to my knowledge. The gentlemen attack the Indian commissioners. I once tried to displace all of these officers by transferring the management of Indian affairs from the Interior Department to the War Department, and I stand ready to vote for that proposition to-day. But so long as we pursue the present policy of intrusting the control of Indian affairs to the Interior Department, in God's name let us appropriate money to carry out that policy. The gentlemen with some seeming vindictiveness strike at the provision for the payment of the expenses of the Indian commissioners—ten gentlemen whom they certify here to be gentlemen of the highest character. Not only is this the fact, but under the law they are serving without one cent of pay. The gentleman from Kentucky, who has lately served upon a committee investigating Indian affairs, wants to remove these ten gentlemen who are serving without pay. Is that in keeping with good economic policy? Let my friend from Kentucky strike at somebody who is receiving pay. Let him strike, for instance, at men such as the gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] has spoken of; men who are charged with doing wrong; men of bad character, as he is pleased to designate them. But pray spare these gentlemen whose characters are so fully certified to, even by the gentleman himself.

Mr. Chairman, I have not been upon a committee of investigation going through the country for the purpose of examining into the propriety of changing the system of managing Indian affairs; but in my humble way I have devoted some attention to this subject. In my judgment these commissioners who visit the agencies throughout the Indian country, making examinations into them, who make and assist in making purchases and in inspections, and who look after the interests of the Indians and the Government generally in the control and management of Indian affairs, have in my judgment contributed largely to the efficiency of that service; and they do all this work without one dollar of pay, all that they receive under this bill, as under all preceding bills that I know anything about, being the mere pittance allowed for the payment of their expenses.

We sent out to the Indian country last summer a commission of able gentlemen, of whom the gentleman from Kentucky was one—I believe he was the chairman. I have no doubt that their expenses were more than those of the whole board of Indian commissioners, and I hope it will be found when the report of that commission is made that their investigations will be found to have been of such a character as to benefit the country much beyond the expense incurred. And, sir, I object to striking out the provision in this bill for the payment of the expenses of this board. In my judgment, to strike down this board of commissioners is almost to destroy the whole service. I would not exchange these commissioners for hardly any other equal number of officers of the service who are receiving pay. And it seems to me, sir, that this war upon the Indian commissioners is not in the direction of economy or the efficiency of the Indian service under its present organization, but directly the opposite, tending to cripple and disable it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCALES. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that the gentleman from Illinois who has this bill in charge cannot receive criticisms upon his bill without charging upon those who make them a desire to delay and attack the measure. I supposed that our reason for considering measures in Committee of the Whole was that there might be the fullest latitude for the discussion of their merits. I admit that the gentleman has done his work well; but we are all fallible; we are all liable to err, and I think the gentlemen from Illinois is certainly as much liable to err as the rest of us. When I think proper to offer amendments——

Mr. SPARKS. I did not make the charge which the gentleman states.

Mr. SCALES. I so understood.

Mr. SPARKS. If I did, I withdraw it. I never intended to intimate anything of the kind.

Mr. SCALES. I am glad the gentleman has made this disavowal; for I assure him that in commenting on this bill I have no hostility toward it. I am anxious that a proper bill should be passed; I am anxious to do something for the benefit of the Indians as well as for the Government. But, sir, if the gentleman believes that the whole Indian service would fall without this Indian commission, why does not his committee, in reporting the Army appropriation bill, go outside of the regular Army officers and provide that ten philanthropic gentlemen shall be taken from different parts of the Union at an expense of $15,000 in order that they may assist the Secretary of War in supervising the administration of the War Department? Why does not the Committee on Appropriations apply the same principle to the Navy Department? Why not to the Treasury Department, where, if reports are true, it is much needed? Nothing of the kind is proposed in reference to these other Departments; the measure is reserved exclusively for the Indian Department. I apprehend that this provision was adopted originally with the view of finding places for gentlemen who have such wealth that they do not need any salary but are glad to take a position which affords much recreation and pleasure at the expense of the Government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I undertake to say (and I defy contradiction) that every single duty imposed upon these commissioners ought to be performed by officers of the Government already appointed and receiving salary, and will be performed by these officers, if they do their duty, just as well as by these commissioners.

Now, sir, if the Secretary of the Interior does his duty, and I take pleasure in saying I believe he will attempt it, I believe he is making an honest effort for reform in that branch of the service; if the Commissioner of Indian Affairs will do his duty, and I believe he is trying to do it, and will make an honest effort in that direction; I believe, if they will look to it that proper agents and proper inspectors are charged with the duty of preventing frauds upon these Indians; I say if they are honest, then there is no occasion or necessity for $15,000 to pay gentlemen outside. The statute has established the fact that they were philanthropic and intelligent gentlemen. It will so go down to all generations. Let this suffice. This is some compensation for their trouble. Let us hold our officers to a rigid responsibility. Let us require them to do their duty, their whole duty, and not go outside to get men to join the Secretary of the Interior in order to aid him in doing what he claims he can do. To divide the responsibility and put his Department under supervision of this commission and keep it there, notwithstanding his efforts to reform, is a reflection upon his administration. I hope the House will understand this matter fully. I hope they will give it the necessary attention, and not vote as partisans, for this is not a party question, but as men who have at heart the interest of the Indians as well as the interests of the Government.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes to appropriate between four and five million dollars for the Indians of this country. As everybody knows the Indians are not civilized, or at least but very few of them. Many of them are wild savages, very few of them having any education. Congress has endeavored to throw as many safeguards around the rights of these Indians, under the appropriations of money which have been made for their benefit, as possible. Out of this abundant caution on the part of the Government this commission has arisen. It is true we have inspectors, it is true we have an Indian Commissioner, it is true we have Indian agents and all these salaried officers; but this commission has been deemed in the wisdom of Congress and out of abundant caution to be necessary so they might have a supervisory control over this whole question. The statute creating this commission gives authority to it to examine contracts, to look into the books and inspect everything connected with the appropriation of money and its expenditure so far as these Indians are concerned. They are also authorized to examine the goods and provisions purchased for the Indians. As has been said, and what is known by the House, these men are of the highest respectability. They draw no salary. The pitiable and contemptible sum of $15,000 only is appropriated for the purpose of paying their expenses. All the labors which they undertake are performed without any compensation. It seems to me gentlemen who are so anxious to protect the rights of the Indian, and we have heard that on every side of the House to-day—we have heard gentlemen declaiming eloquently in behalf of the poor Indians—it seems to me it is a small outlay if we can thereby engage the services of ten gentlemen of high respectability and integrity whose moral character has not been impugned by a single insinuation on the part of any one on the floor to-day—I say it is a very small outlay if thereby we can engage the services of ten gentlemen in the discharge of such a Christian duty as guarding and protecting the rights of these Indians. It is the smallest possible sum for such large and important services.

Now, the gentleman complains this supervisory commission has not been raised with regard to the Army or the Navy. Does the gentleman intend to say our soldiers are as ignorant as the Indians? Certainly not. And yet his argument would lead to that. Does he intend to say our sailors are not capable of protecting their rights? Yet his argument would lead to that. I know the gentleman means no such thing. He means to make no such insinuation, for there is no gentleman upon this floor who has a higher regard for the honor of the Army and the reputation of our soldiers and sailors of the country than my honorable friend from North Carolina. And yet his argument leads to that conclusion and no other.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLS. Let me ask the gentleman from Tennessee to remember that in the War Department a few years ago there did seem to be a necessity for the establishment there of a commission like this.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. SPARKS. I hope this debate will now close.

Mr. EAMES. Mr. Chairman, the committee will indulge me in a word before the vote is taken upon the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina. I am personally acquainted with one of the gentlemen of this board, who has served for about four years and who is now president of it. I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina that gentleman has served the Government faithfully and efficiently in this duty without other compensation than the payment of the simple expense incurred. In the discharge of this duty he has been from the State of Rhode Island, where he resides, three times across the country to San Francisco, once to Oregon, and often to other portions of the country. I speak of my own personal knowledge of one of his visits to San Francisco because I was with him when he was on this mission. I know he gave his personal attention to the contracts for supplies and the inspection of them. And I vouch for him as the gentleman from Michigan vouches for another member of the board from his State, that he is a gentleman of the highest character and integrity, of great intelligence and large practical business experience.

And I am informed also that this commissioner and some others have been before the gentleman's committee, the Committee on Indian Affairs; and before we act upon this matter, I, for one, hope we shall have before this House the evidence which has been presented to the committee that we may know whether this board of commissioners have been efficient in the duties which have been assigned to them, and whether their services have not saved to the Government a much larger amount than is appropriated by this bill. I hope the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina will not prevail.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SCALES to strike out the paragraph, there were—ayes 33, noes 90.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following paragraph:

Pay of Indian police: For the services of not exceeding eight hundred privates, at $5 per month each, and not exceeding one hundred officers, at $8 per month each, of Indian police, and for equipments, to be employed in maintaining order and prohibiting illegal traffic in liquor on the several Indian reservations, $60,000: Provided, That Indians employed at agencies in any capacity shall not be construed as part of agency employés named in section 5 of the act making appropriations for the Indian service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, approved March 3, 1875.

Mr. SCALES. I raise the point of order on that appropriation. Under the present law there is provision made for a little over four hundred of these police. This section increases the number to eight hundred. It puts this force under the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and I suppose they must report to him and he must have the control of them. To that extent it is an increase of the Army force maintained by the Government. In addition to that he wants three thousand cavalry. Put the two together and we have a force of four thousand men. I raise the point of order that this is contrary to existing law.

Mr. SPARKS. The law of last Congress makes provision for the employment of four hundred privates and fifty officers. The service this year is just double, eight hundred privates and one hundred officers. We are simply in this section proposing to increase the service from four hundred and fifty to nine hundred. There is no new legislation. I think the point of order cannot be sustained.

Mr. SCALES. I submit that the point of order is well taken. There are now authorized by law only four hundred of these police. The gentleman now asks us to make a law providing for eight hundred. Is there any law to-day for eight hundred police in that Indian Territory? Not a particle. Is there a law for four hundred? There is. There being, then, a law for four hundred and not for eight hundred, this changes existing law. It is therefore out of order, and certainly it is not in the interest of economy.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the point is well taken.

Mr. SPARKS. As I understand, the ruling of the Chair on the point of order has reference only to the increase.

Mr. SCALES. If the increase is stricken out I am satisfied.

Mr. SPARKS. The point of order of the gentleman applied only to the increase from four hundred privates to eight hundred privates and from fifty officers to one hundred officers.

Mr. SCALES. The gentleman can move an amendment reducing the number.

Mr. PHILLIPS. And the total should also be reduced.

Mr. SPARKS. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out "eight hundred" and insert "four hundred;" strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty;" strike out "$60,000" and insert "$30,600;" so that it will read:

Pay of Indian police: For the services of not exceeding four hundred privates at $5 per month each, and not exceeding fifty officers at $8 per month each, of Indian police, and for equipments, to be employed in maintaining order and prohibiting illegal traffic in liquor on the several Indian reservations, $30,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following paragraph:

And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay, or cause to be paid, in equal portions, to Susanna Marble, Millie Frances Lee, and John Abel Lee, heirs of Abel S. Lee, or their legal representatives, the sum of $2,915, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the 9th day of June, 1872, out of any money appropriated by this act for the benefit of the Kiowa tribe of Indians; the said payment to be in full of all claims of the said heirs of said Abel S. Lee and of the amount allowed them by the Indian Bureau for property belonging to said Abel S. Lee taken and destroyed by the said Kiowa Indians in the year 1872.

Mr. SPARKS. I make the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. SPARKS. It is special legislation and increases the expenditure.

Mr. BLOUNT. I make the further point of order that it is not germane to this bill, and is liable to the same ruling we had yesterday in reference to one of these claims under Rule 48.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. In relation to the point of order I have this to say, that when the appropriation bill was up last year, and the year before, a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs offered a precisely similar amendment to this in reference to the persons known as the Germon girls, and that amendment was agreed to. This amendment is germane to this bill because this bill makes an appropriation for the benefit of the Kiowa Indians, and the amendment provides there shall be deducted from the amount of money to be paid to the Kiowas $2,915, to be applied for the benefit of these captive girls. It does not increase expenditure and is in pursuance of existing law, because the law prescribes these claims shall be examined by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and that the Secretary of the Interior shall report upon them to Congress for appropriation. This has been done; and the Committee on Indian Affairs, having examined the case, have unanimously reported a bill containing the substance of this amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. Has that bill been reported?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Yes; it was a unanimous report.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then the amendment is clearly objectionable to the point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. I will ask the gentleman a question, and it is, if the case he refers to was not allowed as a matter of mere sympathy and kindness on the part of the House; if the point of order was not made at the time that it was not germane, and if it was not admitted as a matter of sympathy and kindness?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I do not really remember.

Mr. ATKINS. I think the gentleman will find that that was the fact.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Then I would appeal to the gentleman from Illinois to extend that same sympathy to these girls. I ask to have the report of the committee read.

The Clerk read the report as follows:

In 1872, and for some time previous thereto, Abel S. Lee, with his family, a wife and four children, resided in Buchanan County, Texas, on a pre-emption claim of 160 acres of land, duly made under the laws of Texas. On Sunday, June 9, 1872, while the family were engaged in devotional exercises in their own house, they were attacked by a band of Kiowa Indians. The father, who was sitting in the door of his house, was shot and instantly killed. The savages, eight or nine in number, then rushed into the dwelling and killed the mother and Rebecca, one of the daughters, aged thirteen years. The house was plundered, and such articles as could not be conveniently carried away were destroyed. A portion of the stock was taken, part was killed, and the rest, which was left to run wild, was wholly lost to the heirs, the present claimants. The three children named in the bill were carried into captivity, and so held for a number of months, when, by the intervention of an Indian agent, they were released. During their captivity they suffered almost indescribable cruelties and indignities. The foregoing facts, with others too horrible for recital, are fully proven by the evidence submitted, and the value of the property taken and destroyed is conclusively established. The outrage was entirely without provocation, the home of the Lees being many miles from the reservation, and they having been always a peaceful and law-abiding family. As originally submitted, this claim embraced a demand for $25,000 for the loss to the children of the care and support of the parents and as indemnity for the sufferings sustained during their captivity; but this has been abandoned, and the claimants now only ask to be reimbursed, out of the annuities or other funds paid by the Government to this tribe, for actual losses. By treaty stipulations with this tribe the payment of such claims is expressly provided for, and we are clearly of the opinion that the present is a case emphatically calling for the enforcement of the provision. The claim was duly examined, and its allowance, except as to interest, recommended by the honorable Commissioner of Indian Affairs, on the 6th of March, 1875. The bill should, we think, be so amended as to specify that the sum awarded be paid out of funds due or to become due to the tribe by members of which the depredation was committed, instead of from the general Treasury, and also so as to give the names of all of the heirs or claimants. We therefore submit the accompanying amendment and recommend its adoption, and that the bill, as so amended, be passed.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to say a word upon the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] and the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.] I think it is very important that this matter should be settled definitively, and settled correctly according to the precedents and the history which are concurrent with the adoption of this rule. The rule which is referred to by the gentleman is Rule 48, and is as follows:

No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

Then follows the clause which is specially referred to by the gentleman from Georgia:

No bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith any other bill or resolution pending before the House.

Now, when this same question was under discussion at a former session of Congress the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] was in the chair and the same point was made in reference to an amendment which was offered. The objection was made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.] The Chair ruled upon the point not that it was a violation of that portion of the rule which prevented its being applied because there was no law for it and it was not in the line of economy, but that it was obnoxious to that portion of the rule which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] now invokes in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

Now the rule upon the subject was adopted under these circumstances, and the circumstances under which the rule was adopted show what the House meant by it. This is the interpretation put upon it. I read from Barclay's Digest, page 172:

The latter clause of this rule was adopted at the first session of the Twenty-fifth Congress, and as originally reported by the committee the following words were contained at the end of it: "Nor by any proposition containing the substance, in whole or in part, of any other bill or resolution pending before the House." These words were stricken out by the House before it would agree to the rule; by which it would seem to be decided that a bill or resolution might be amended by incorporating therein the substance of any other bill or resolution before the House. Such has been the general practice of the House.

When the rule came up for consideration and adoption by the House the words I have just read, namely, that you could not embody the substance of a bill pending, were stricken out by the House before it would agree to the rule, by which it would seem to have been decided that an amendment containing the substance of another bill or resolution may be entertained as amendment, and the commentator says that such has been the practice of the House ever since.

It would appear, therefore, that upon the adoption of the rule which was referred to by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] the Committee on Rules, in reporting this forty-eighth rule, went so far in proposing to limit the power of amendment as to interdict an amendment being offered which contained the substance or part of any measure pending before the House, but the action of the House was such as to show that it did not intend by the adoption of the forty-eighth rule to limit the power and ability to legislate upon a measure which might in part be cognate to the subject-matter under discussion. They did not mean, in other words, to limit their own power, and hence they did not adopt the rule as reported; but they adopted that part of it which said that you shall not offer as an amendment to one bill a pending measure in totidem verbis. That was proper, and the action of the House in excluding the words reported by the committee shows what was the purpose of the House in adopting the rule. It modified the rule as reported by the committee, and as it now stands it does not apply to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. THROCKMORTON.]

I cite a case when this question was presented in the House. It was a case where the objection was made that a certain amendment offered was equivalent to the bill pending. I refer to page 1333 of the Journal of the House of Representatives, first session of the Thirty-first Congress, where will be found an emphatic ruling on the precise point involved here.

The pending proposition was as follows:

"SEC. 33. And be it further enacted, That the Constitution and laws of the United States are hereby extended over and declared to be in force in said Territory of Utah, so far as the same or any provision thereof may be applicable."

Mr. Meade made the point of order that the said amendment was not germane to the measure under consideration, and that it contained provisions similar to bills already before the House, and that consequently under the fifty-fifth rule it was out of order.

The Speaker stated that he was of opinion that the bill from the Senate under consideration brings before the House the question of the territory acquired by us from Mexico, and that all propositions affecting that territory—proposing to dispose of it or to provide for it—are germane to the bill, and are in order as amendments. With regard to the second ground taken by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Meade] the Chair had understood that the amendment was not the same in all its provisions as the bills which have come before the Senate. That being the case, though it includes the same provisions to a very great extent, it does not come within the rule, but is in order. He therefore overruled the point of order.

From this decision of the Chair Mr. Schenck appealed, and the decision of the Chair was sustained by a yea-and-nay vote of 122 to 84.

Mr. BLOUNT. The remarks of the gentleman who has just taken his seat are only as to Rule 48. So far as the first objection made both by myself and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] is concerned, that this proposition is not germane to this bill, it does seem to me that it is entirely incontrovertible. What is the bill? Simply a bill appropriating money for the Indian service; just that and nothing more. What is the proposition here? It is to pay a claim to some one outside of that service. It is simply a claim, and is not, in my judgment, germane to any appropriation bill, but if germane to any, certainly only to a deficiency bill or the sundry civil bill.

I have never known it held that any claim against the Indians was germane to a bill appropriating money for the Indian service. Therefore, it seems to me clear that on this ground alone the amendment should not be entertained by the committee, and also upon Rule 48, "that no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment."

This bill is to provide for the Indian service, and the amendment is an attempt to inject the claim against certain tribes of Indians.

The rule further says "that no bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith any other bill or resolution pending before the House."

Now, I have not had time to go into the history of this portion of the rule, but its language is plain and clear.

There is another bill before the House for the payment of this very claim, and it is proposed now to insert that bill in this appropriation bill.

The point of order made is in conformity with the practice of the House in every instance where the question has been raised.

Mr. SPARKS. I hope now that we shall have a ruling of the Chair on the point of order.

Mr. HOOKER. A single word further. The argument of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] falls to the ground when he says that the measure or amendment is not germane to the subject-matter of the bill. This bill is one making appropriations for the Indian service, and therefore the amendment is germane to the bill. The gentleman has made no answer, and I undertake to say that he can make none, to the argument which I made that the exclusion by the House from the rule of the proposition to interdict a portion of a bill or the substance of it by way of amendment was equivalent to allowing such an amendment to be offered.

Mr. MILLS. One remark in addition to what my friend from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] has said. This appropriation is made by Congress to satisfy claims due to Indians under a treaty. The proposition of my colleague [Mr. THROCKMORTON] is to satisfy a claim of the same kind under a treaty, and they are both on the same basis.

Mr. SPARKS. At all events it is a claim.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. The Kiowa Indians in their treaty consented that deductions should be made from the moneys paid to them where they had committed depredations upon property of white citizens. This amendment, therefore, is in pursuance of treaty and of law.

Mr. SPARKS. I ask for a ruling on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the opinion of the Chair that the point of order is well taken, and that the amendment is not in order.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LIGON reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 5534) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. SPARKS. I call for the previous question upon the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote asked upon any of the amendments?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I call for a separate vote upon the amendment in relation to transporting Indians to the Indian Territory.

The SPEAKER. The question will be taken upon that amendment first; and if a separate vote is not called for upon any other amendment they will be voted upon together.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest that by unanimous consent the session of the House to-morrow be for debate only; there will hardly be a quorum present.

Many MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. ATKINS. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I merely make the suggestion.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Will there be a quorom here to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer that until the time arrives. Should there be no quorum present, it will be in the power of any gentleman to prevent business being transacted.

The amendment upon which Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, called for a separate vote was to the following paragraph:

Collecting and subsisting Apaches and other Indians of Arizona and New Mexico: For this amount, to subsist and properly care for the Apache and other Indians in Arizona and New Mexico who have been or may be collected on reservations in New Mexico or Arizona, $320,000.

The amendment was to add the following:

And the President of the United States is hereby directed to prohibit the removal of any portion of said tribes of Indians to the Indian Territory, unless the same shall be hereafter authorized by act of Congress.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. On that amendment I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—ayes 25, noes 78.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 98, nays 94, not voting 100; as follows:

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. My colleague, Mr. VANCE, has been called away from the House by indisposition.

Mr. MULLER. My colleague from New York, Mr. COX, is paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. EVANS.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I am paired with the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. STEWART. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. PUGH. My colleague, Mr. SINNICKSON, is paired with my colleague, Mr. CLARK.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I am paired upon all political questions with my colleague, Mr. BEEBE. As this seems to be made such a question, I decline to vote.

Mr. BROWNE. My colleague, Mr. HUNTER, is paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. WILLIS.

Mr. DUNNELL. My colleague, Mr. STRAIT, is paired with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. DIBRELL.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The remaining amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were then concurred in.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPARKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALLEGED CORRUPTION OF MEMBERS.

Mr. HARRISON. I rise to make a privileged report, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, to which was referred the following resolution of Mr. BRENTANO, of Illinois:

"Whereas the Washington Post, a daily newspaper published in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, did, in its issue of July 24, 1878, contain in its editorial columns an article headed 'Those special assessments—Who are the principal debtors—How the 3.65 clause was passed,' and which article, charging corruption against members of Congress in reference to the bill providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, concludes as follows:

"'There are some ugly rumors afloat as to the manner in which the corruption fund to secure the passage of the bill was disposed of, and who received it. An indignant property-owner avers that a Vermont Representative got away with $25,000, and a Chicago member and a Maryland member with $12,250 apiece, and that the balance of the fund went to the Senate committee.'

"Whereas the facts alleged in said article and the averment of 'an indignant property-owner' published in said article constitute the charge of the crime of accepting a bribe by members of Congress, the punishment for which is provided for in section 5500 of the Revised Statutes; and

"Whereas the substance of said article and the charges contained therein have been telegraphed by special dispatches and by the Associated Press all over the country and otherwise copied and spread out by many newspapers: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service be, and it is hereby, directed to inquire into the said charges against certain members of this House, and to report at any time to this House whether any member, especially any member from Vermont, Chicago, or Maryland, is guilty of any act as charged in said article of the Washington Post; and the committee is authorized to send for persons and papers"—

Having had the same under consideration, most respectfully submit the following report:

That it brought before it Mr. Stilson Hutchins, editor and publisher of the Washington Post; Mr. Barton, the writer of the article named in said resolution; Mr. Baker, president of the First National Bank of New York; and Messrs. BRENTANO, HENDEE, and HENKLE, members of this House, and several other witnesses; in fact, all persons suggested to it as being able to give it any information on the subject; that all witnesses were sworn and testified under oath.

Your committee was earnest in its endeavor to bring out the bottom facts, but could not elicit a particle of testimony tending to show that any money was used or any corrupt influences brought to bear to further the passage of the District bill as alleged in the article named in said resolution.

Mr. Hutchins testified that he heard about the time of the publication of said article rumors of corruption in connection with said bill, but that they made but little impression upon him; that he received several communications on the subject, some of them anonymous, others with fictitious names, and a few with real names signed to them, but that none of them named any particular member of the District Committee or of this House as having been corruptly influenced; that he handed all such communications over to Mr. Barton, one of his staff, with instructions to look into the matter and write an article thereon; that he did not remember and could not recall the name of a single person signed to any of the communications or circulating such rumors; that had he seen the article before publication he would have suppressed the last part, which seemed to locate members suspected of corruption.

Mr. Barton testified that he did look into the matter, but could find no real foundation for the charges; that he could recall but one name signed to any of the communications appearing in the directory; that a paper signed "Indignant property-owner" was also signed by one Johnson, and said Johnson's name was in the directory. He could not remember the first name. We handed him the directory with the request that he refresh his memory. He was unable to do so. The remarkable discovery was then made that there are seventeen columns of Johnsons and only fifteen of Smiths, only one or two other names occupying as much as ten columns. He stated that the charge that the First National Bank of New York had raised a pool for corrupt purposes in connection with the District bill was simply a street rumor, which he did not believe even at the time; that such rumors were started in connection with all District legislation; that as his article did not specifically touch any particular member there was no danger of a libel suit, and therefore all of the communications went to the waste-basket; that he had not heard anything implicating any particular member of this House.

Mr. Baker, president of the First National Bank of New York, testified that his bank held about a half million of the 3.65 District bonds; held them as an investment, and not as speculation; that they considered the same, at the ruling rate of money for the past year, as worth to them about ninety-three dollars on the hundred; that they were higher before the passage of the bill than after; that they had gone to 85 before the passage of the bill, but had since fallen to about 76 and 78; that another concern, the Mutual Life of New York, held about a million—held them as an investment and not as a speculation; that no money had been used by his bank, or by the Mutual Life, or by any one for them, directly or indirectly, to further the passage of the bill in question or any other bill connected with the District; that neither he, his bank, nor any one connected with it, or the Mutual Life, had ever been approached to raise any money or pool in connection with the matter, and that he had no reason to believe any money had been so raised or expended; that he did not consider that the passage of this bill made his bonds more valuable, and that they had not disposed of them; that they always considered the Government bound for the 3.65 bonds, and that this bill did not increase the liability of the Government.

Messrs. BRENTANO, HENDEE, and HENKLE severally testified that they had not, nor had either one of them, ever heard any intimation that any money was being or had been used to influence legislation in connection with this bill; that neither one of them had ever been approached with any corrupt proposition in connection with it, and they did not believe any money had been so used; that the clause in the bill in reference to the 3.65 bonds had been passed by a unanimous vote of the committee, and its propriety was not questioned; that it had come down as a legacy from as far back as the Forty-third Congress.

The other witnesses, Messrs. Alexander, Offley, Curtis, and MacBride, had heard rumors, but nothing further, and could give us no names or facts connected therewith.

Your committee is therefore of the opinion that the publication in the Washington Post of the article referred to in Mr. BRENTANO's resolution was a wanton and wholly unjustifiable attack upon the integrity of members of this House, calculated to degrade them in the estimation of the public, which is too ready to give credence to what it sees in print, and that it was used to do great injury and injustice to the gentlemen alluded to.

Your committee believe that an enlightened and unfettered press is a very bulwark of liberty and a prop to morality in a free country, but that when it steps from its high calling wantonly to belittle and to calumniate public men directly, or by innuendo and insinuation, it becomes a powerful engine of wrong, and is a far-reaching enemy to good morals. A newspaper which boldly exposes wrong-doing among officials, and fearlessly tears away the mask which hides a corrupt officer, is a true friend of the people; but one which for the sake of creating a sensation, or to make its columns spicy, attacks the good as well as the bad, or attacks any without warrant of truth or facts, puts itself on a par with the traducer and slanderer—feeds the lowest tastes of the vicious, destroys its influence for good, and by constantly crying "Wolf!" "Wolf!" is unheeded when it calls attention to the real wolf which is preying upon the public.

At the request of the gentlemen who had reason from their locality to think themselves attacked, we recommend that the report and testimony be printed, and that your committee be discharged from further consideration of the subject.

CARTER H. HARRISON,
Chairman.

Mr. HARRISON. I call for the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report was adopted unanimously.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DURHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the Military Academy appropriation bill, (H. R. No. 5230,) now on the Speaker's table, be taken up, and that the request of the Senate for a conference be granted.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly; and the Speaker announced the appointment of Mr. DURHAM, Mr. CLYMER, and Mr. SMITH of Pennsylvania as the conferees on the part of the House.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that the fortification appropriation bill (H. R. No. 5231) be taken from the Speaker's table and that the request of the Senate for a conference be granted.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly; and the Speaker announced the appointment of Mr. BAKER of Indiana, Mr. CLYMER, and Mr. SINGLETON as the conferees on the part of the House.

PUBLIC PROPERTY AT HARPER'S FERRY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Solicitor of the Treasury, relative to the sale of certain public property at Harper's Ferry, West Virginia; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

GEORGE WAY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting estimate of an appropriation for the payment of George Way for services in connection with the survey of part of the southern Apache reservation in New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

FRAUDULENT NATURALIZATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the clerk of the United States circuit court at New York City, transmitting presentment of the grand jury made at a recent term of the court in reference to fraudulent naturalization of aliens; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYÉS AT DES MOINES RAPIDS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, recommending the passage of a bill for the relief of Government employés at Des Moines Rapids; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:
To Mr. HUMPHREY, for one day;
To Mr. POLLARD, for one day, on account of important business;
To Mr. BAKER, of New York, for three days; and
To Mr. MARTIN, for one day, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MACKEY. I ask consent to introduce——

Mr. CONGER. I would like to know the present position of the Geneva award bill.

The SPEAKER. That bill is the regular order; and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has eighteen minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I suggest that the session of to-morrow be devoted to the consideration of bills to which there is no objection.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I hope that the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] will withdraw that motion in view of the proposition I submit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman from California that Monday, the 6th of January, having been included by the Senate amendment in the resolution for a holiday recess, unless opportunity be given to gentlemen now to introduce bills for reference, they will lose an entire week in getting their propositions before the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced concurrence in House joint resolution No. 211, extending the time for the Joint Committee on the Transfer of the Indian Bureau to submit its report.

Mr. PAGE. I insist on my motion to adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 38.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 20, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a memorial from the association of manufacturers of arms, ammunition, and equipments, and a report of the commanding officer at Springfield, Massachusetts, in relation to the manufacture of arms, ammunition, and equipments for supplying the Army and militia; which, on motion of Mr. DAWES, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. On the 12th of December I presented a petition of citizens of Chicago, Illinois, praying for an appropriation for the construction of a canal from the southwest branch of the Chicago River to the mouth of the Calumet River, in that State. I beg leave to present now a petition on the same subject, signed by the president and board of trustees of the village of Hyde Park, Cook County, Illinois, which is a village adjoining the city of Chicago; and I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of Charles P. Stetson and others, citizens of Clinton County, New York, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MERRIMON. I present a petition signed by numerous citizens of Caswell County, North Carolina, praying for a reduction of the tax on tobacco. The petition is very brief and states their grievances so cogently that I ask to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be reported.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Finance, and was read, as follows:

To the honorable members of the Senate of the United States:

We the undersigned, your petitioners, would respectfully represent to your honorable body that the present tax of twenty four cents per pound on tobacco is not only onerous but is damaging to our business as growers of tobacco; and we believe that a continuation of the tax at the present rate will eventually curtail to a vast extent the production of this staple, and throw out of employment thousands of hands who are dependents upon their labor for support.

We would respectfully state that in this county (Caswell County, North Carolina) there were, before the tax was levied on manufactured tobacco, thirty-odd factories actively engaged in the manufacture of tobacco, and that now all of them have been closed and without any prospect of their resuming work so long as the present high rate of tax is imposed.

We would further state that so long as the tax remains unsettled, we will suffer from the evil consequences, as it damages the trade and unsettles prices.

Therefore we would respectfully pray for a speedy settlement of the question by reducing the same. And this we will ever in duty bound to pray, &c.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of Matthew O. Regan, late of Company E, Third United States Artillery, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I present the petition of eight hundred of our most respectable ladies of Nebraska, praying for a prohibitory law on the subject of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia. It is very short, and I should be glad to have it read and then referred.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be read if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The mothers, wives, daughters, and sisters, of this great Republic, yours and those of your constituents, pray your honorable bodies to pass a law in the District of Columbia, over which you have jurisdiction, which, if copied in all our States and Territories, would save to them their fathers, husbands, sons, and brothers from the bondage of strong drink. They pray you to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia, except for medicinal, mechanical, and scientific purposes.

And they will continue to pray.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The Committee on Finance is the proper committee, I suppose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Being limited as it is, the Chair thinks the proper reference of the petition would be to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Very well; let it take that course.

The petition was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1554) relating to printing impressions from portraits and vignettes, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Printing, where it evidently ought to go. I submit that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I am directed by the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 838) for the relief of settlers on certain lands in the State of California, to report it adversely. The report is in writing and very brief, and I ask that it may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred Senate bill No. 838, for the relief of settlers on certain lands in the State of California, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report:

That the same bill was referred to this committee as Senate bill No. 623 at the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, and then considered by said committee, who, on the 21st of June, 1876, through Senator Bogy, made an adverse report (No. 413) thereon, and that in accordance with the recommendation of said report the said bill was on the same day (June 21, 1876) indefinitely postponed by the Senate. And as no new case has been presented nor any new evidence submitted to your committee since this action of the Senate, a due respect for the Senate, as well as a conviction that it would be unwise under such circumstances to review the action of both the committee and the Senate, induce your committee to decline the reconsideration of the case; and your committee are also of the opinion that the case falls within the spirit of Senate Rule 58, forbidding further consideration of the case without a memorial stating newly discovered evidence. The committee therefore recommend that the bill be again indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The adverse report will be printed and an order for the indefinite postponement of the bill entered.

Mr. DORSEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, presented a plan submitted to that committee by Benjamin Severson for the improvement of the sewerage and the sanitary condition of the city of Washington; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN SURVEYS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution from the House of Representatives to print three thousand copies of the report of the Geographical and Geological Survey of the Rocky Mountain Region relating to the geology of the high plateaus of Utah, have instructed me to report the same back with amendments and to ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 3,000 copies of the report of the Geographical and Geological Survey of the Rocky Mountain Region relating to the geology of the high plateaus of Utah, in quarto form, with the necessary illustrations and charts; 1,500 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 500 for the use of the Senate, 500 for the use of the survey, and 500 for the use of the Smithsonian Institution; the illustrations and charts to be made by the Public Printer, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

The resolution was reported from the Committee on Printing with amendments, so as to make it read:

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives to print 3,000 copies of the Geographical and Geological Survey of the Rocky Mountain Region, being volume 2, Contributions to North American Ethnology, in quarto form, to report it back with amendments and to ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution; which was read, as follows:

The resolution was reported from the Committee on Printing with amendments, so as to make it read as follows:

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was concurred in.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOWE (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1555) granting a pension to Fannie Lull; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KERNAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1556) granting a pension to Mark J. Bunnell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GARLAND asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1557) to provide for the reappraisement and sale of the abandoned military reservation at Fort Smith, Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BRUCE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1558) for the relief of W. J. Cowan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CONOVER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

WARREN MITCHELL.

Mr. McCREERY. Mr. President, I give notice that on Thursday, the 9th day of January, 1879, I shall make a motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 855) for the relief of Warren Mitchell, of Kentucky. He has waited long, and if he is entitled to anything I think he ought to have it, and if he is entitled to nothing he ought to know it. I ask that the consideration of this subject be made the special order for that day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. INGALLS and Mr. MITCHELL objected.

Mr. MITCHELL. I object for several reasons.

Mr. McCREERY. I give notice, then, that on that day I shall make the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to state to my friend from Kentucky that the principal reason why I make the objection at this time to making the bill a special order arises from the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] gave notice yesterday that on that day he would move to take up the bill for the relief of Mr. Holladay.

Mr. McCREERY. I move, then, that the bill for the relief of Warren Mitchell be made the special order for the next day, Friday, the 10th of January.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am not willing at this time to consent that that bill shall be made the special order for any particular day, not because I am unwilling that the bill should be considered as soon as it reasonably can be, but there may be circumstances which will prevent its consideration at that time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the bill the title of which he has named be made the special order for Friday, the 10th of January.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A bill for the relief of Warren Mitchell.

Mr. CONKLING. A private bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands, but he knows nothing of its character.

Mr. McMILLAN. I can answer the question of the Senator from New York. It is a private bill, Mr. President.

Mr. CONKLING. I was only going to make this observation: were this a public bill, unless a bill of very commanding importance, I should not like to consent now to make it a special order. Special orders during the short session of Congress particularly, made by guess-work two or three weeks in advance, I have observed are apt to be very embarrassing matters. If the honorable Senator from Kentucky wishes at any time to address the Senate upon this bill, he knows from his experience how glad the Senate will be to hear him and to consult his convenience as to the time and the occasion; but if his purpose is to take up this bill, involving, as I presume it does, questions of much controversy, and to have the Senate this morning make an order by which it shall have a lodgment on a particular day, to keep its place, that kind of place which only two-thirds of the Senate can give it, I object; because, although when the time comes there may be no objection it is also true that when the time comes there may be great objection, and without being able to foresee, as we cannot now foresee, looking over this recess, what the position of the Senate and the situation of its business will be at that time, I hope this bill will not be made a special order. If the honorable Senator will give notice that at that time he will ask to have the bill taken up, no doubt it will be taken up unless at that time there is some serious objection to it, and there can be no objection which would prevail with the Senate in standing in the way of the Senator's wish to submit any remarks or do anything that he chooses which concerns his own convenience.

Mr. McCREERY. I am not ambitious, Mr. President, to submit remarks on this or any other subject. This matter, however, has been before the Senate about four years. The claim has been outstanding for about eleven or twelve years. I think it is time for this reason that the Senate should proceed to the consideration of the matter. If, as I remarked awhile ago, the claimant is entitled to this money, give it to him; if not, say so. I hope the Senate therefore will make this bill the special order for the 10th day of January.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, there is already one special order before the Senate. Senate bill No. 300, amending the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes, has been assigned for Tuesday the 7th of January, at one o'clock. I have already given notice that at the conclusion of the consideration of that bill I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of a public measure of very great importance, that is to say, the bill granting arrears of pensions to the soldiers and sailors who are now upon the pension list, involving the interests of two hundred thousand of the soldiers and sailors of the Republic.

Mr. CONKLING. Whose claims are older in time than this.

Mr. INGALLS. Whose claims are older, as the Senator from New York well suggests, than the claim even of Warren Mitchell. But I have a still further objection to the consideration of this bill as a special order. It is true that it is an old claim, but it is a claim that has been adjudicated by the courts of the United States and decided adversely to the claimant here by the Supreme Court after a full and exhaustive examination. It involves the consideration of questions that I conceive the Senate are not ready upon short notice to deliberate upon, and I hope the Senate, or at least two-thirds of the Senate, will not be willing at this time to give their consent to the consideration of a claim of this description in opposition to the measures to which I have asked the attention of the Senate in regard to the arrears of pension.

Mr. McMILLAN. So far as I am concerned, and the Committee on Claims who have had charge of this question, there will be no opposition to the consideration of this matter at any time that it may reasonably be taken up; but to fix a day and make this bill the special order for that day is a step which I consider would be very ill-advised. The claim involves an amount exceeding $100,000. There is a divided report of the committee upon the subject, the majority report being adverse to this claim.

Mr. McCREERY. I withdraw the motion to make the bill a special order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky withdraws the motion.

Mr. McCREERY. I give notice that on that day, Friday, the 10th of January next, I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is all right.

SEWERAGE OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. DORSEY. I offer the following order:

Ordered, That the Public Printer be authorized to stitch in a single volume, for the use of the Committee on the District of Columbia, 200 copies of the several plans submitted to that committee under the authority of the Senate for the improvement of the sewerage and sanitary condition of the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the rule the order will go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. DORSEY. I should be glad if it did not take that reference. There is a large number of these plans, which have been submitted by different engineers, and they have been printed separately in small pamphlets. This order is simply to have them stitched together.

Mr. DAWES. They are printed?

Mr. DORSEY. They are printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. DORSEY. I say I prefer not to have the reference made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent to grant the order without a reference to the appropriate committee.

Mr. DORSEY. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there unanimous consent that this order be granted? The Chair hears no objection, and it is granted.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF COUNT DE ROCHAMBEAU.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing the official papers of General the Count de Rochambeau when in command of the French forces in America.

Upon this resolution I desire very briefly to address the Senate.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is the duty of every people to preserve the materials of their history. It is a duty which they owe to themselves, to the passing generation, and to posterity, which will be stimulated by the successes and warned by the errors of the past. Especially is this the duty of a free people, whose liberties have been snatched, as all liberty has been, from the grasp of domestic tyrants or of external oppressors. The most precious possession of a nation is the fame of its children who have illustrated its annals with the examples of patriotism and valor, or have dignified them with statesmanship, eloquence, and scholarship. And when these examples are afforded by men who did not owe allegiance to it, citizens of another country, gratitude pleads with duty for the preservation of their memory. So long as the American people hold in just reverence the names of Washington and Greene, and Jefferson and Franklin, they can never be indifferent to those of La Fayette, of Rochambeau, of Kosciusko, of Pulaski. That they, without the claim of patriotism, but impelled by the bonds of the great brotherhood of liberty, gave their swords to a foreign people struggling for their independence, strengthens their claim upon the grateful consideration of that people, and imposes a higher obligation to render justice to their fame. The renown which they won upon our soil is a part of our national inheritance; it takes a place in the imperishable records of our history. Their glory is a portion of our glory; and America divides with the countries of their birth the honor of their fame. Among those who came to our aid from foreign countries in the war of the Revolution, but one name is more illustrious than that of Rochambeau; but one has a higher title to the gratitude of the American people, and that the name of his compatriot.

How much we were indebted to the alliance with France for the consummation of our independence is a matter of history, and from that alliance and the important assistance rendered to our country by reason of it, has sprung between the two nations a firm and lasting friendship which it is alike the disposition and the interest of each to strengthen. Whatever illustrates the joint operations and services of the forces of the two governments serves this end, besides contributing to general history.

The Count de Rochambeau was born on the 1st of July, 1725. Descended from a noble and distinguished family, and in a military age, he was destined, from his youth, to the profession of arms, on which he entered in his seventeenth year. He served under Broglie; and at the age of twenty he became aid-de-camp to Philip, Duke of Orleans. He afterwards commanded a regiment, and was distinguished at Lofeldt, where he was wounded, and at other places. He pursued his military career till he rose to the rank of lieutenant-general, and was sent at the head of the French corps to the aid of the Americans in the war of the Revolution.

Bancroft says:

For the command Count de Rochambeau was selected, not by court favor, but from the consideration in which he was held by the troops.

What eminent and distinguished services Count de Rochambeau rendered to our struggling nationality, from his landing at Newport to the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown, I need not recall to the Senate. He won a name illustrious in American and in French history, and adorned the annals of both with brilliant achievements.

The official papers and correspondence of Count de Rochambeau, while in command in America, were carefully preserved, and have descended to his grandson, the Marquis de Rochambeau, himself a distinguished scholar and antiquarian. It has been his desire to prepare them for the press and to edit their publication. But his means, greatly diminished from those that anciently supported the dignity of his house, were insufficient for this purpose, and he offers the papers to the Government whose history they illustrate. From an article on the subject in the Philadelphia Librarian, written by a distinguished student of history, I take the following account of these papers:

The Rochambeau papers is the collection of official documents made by the Count de Rochambeau in his important position as commander-in-chief of the French forces. It consists of nearly fifteen hundred pieces, a large number of autograph letters of Washington, many of Samuel Adams, Benjamin Talmadge, Sir Guy Carleton, Nathaniel Green, the Prince de Leontbarey, Count de Ségur, Sir Henry Clinton, Luzerne, Vaudreuil, de Choisy, de Damas—a great many letters in cipher, with the key and translations, the secret instructions of the French ministry, the official reports of the general and staff officers, abstracts of all official correspondence between France and the American Executive and Army, numerous maps and plans, manuscript and engraved, giving all the topography of the marches and operations of the army, and of the plans proposed and discussed between the several commanders. It contains the official and personal correspondence of the French commander with Washington and La Fayette, with Clinton and Cornwallis, with Necker and the French war department, and these furnish the most detailed and minute particulars of all the operations in which the French forces took part. The instructions of the French government, prescribing the relations of the chief of their forces to Washington and the American Congress, are given in great detail, and so are all the particulars of the money expenditures of the French forces, the daily journal of all their military movements, a minute account of their siege operations, a full roster of their officers and of all details for duty, the reports of each staff department, the complete correspondence with the allied forces and with those of the enemy, as well as with their own home authorities, thus furnishing a vivid picture of the times and scenes in which they moved.

The Rochambeau papers are especially valuable for the unknown and unpublished reports of the subordinate French officers to their commander-in-chief, and Chotteau lays special stress on a private account given by the Duke de Lauzun of the attempted revolt of the colonial militia at Morristown. The records of the councils of war held by the French are very full and furnish many details and particulars of the operations in which, although the forces were combined, the leaders were practically independent. The good sense of Washington and the perfect tact of Rochambeau, older man and older soldier, too, for he was born in 1725, and had gained wounds and honors in the wars in the low countries, at Maestrich and Closstercamp—these characteristic virtues of the two men, rather than any strict military subordination or legal regulation of their respective rank, overcame any difficulties. The Rochambeau papers give a perfect panorama of the siege and surrender of Yorktown, with the minute details of the orderly-books and journals, the daily service of the troops, the reports of all operations of the engineers, the text of the capitulation as it was first proposed, and the final modification on which it was at length surrendered. Rochambeau's correspondence with the authorities in France gives his mature judgment, and it was always favorable to the patriotism and purity of the American leaders with whom he was so intimately associated. The "papers" close chronologically with the particulars of his return to France and the safe arrival of his troops there, and his final report and the distribution of honors on his recommendation. It is sad to see among the names of those who were active and distinguished in behalf of American liberty those who were soon to fall victims to the awful tragedies committed in the name of liberty in France.

I commend this subject to the attention of the Committee on the Library, and hope it will take the preliminary steps to place this precious collection of official papers within the custody of the American Government and within the reach of American students.

The resolution was agreed to.

HARBOR OF REFUGE ON PACIFIC COAST.

Mr. MITCHELL. I give notice that on the 7th of January, after the morning business, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1451) authorizing the construction of a breakwater and harbor of refuge on the Pacific coast, for the purpose of addressing the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 5534) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5230) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MILTON J. DURHAM of Kentucky, Mr. HIESTER CLYMER of Pennsylvania, and Mr. A. HERR SMITH of Pennsylvania managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5231) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHN H. BAKER of Indiana, Mr. HIESTER CLYMER of Pennsylvania, and Mr. OTHO R. SINGLETON of Mississippi managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the printing of 8,000 copies of the eulogies delivered in the House of Representatives and to be delivered in the Senate upon J. E. Leonard, deceased, late a member of the House from the fifth district of Louisiana; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 5682) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for transportation of mails by railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879;

A bill (H. R. No. 5683) to amend an act approved June 20, 1878, and to fix the rate of interest on bonds authorized by said act to be issued by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 210) making an appropriation for the purpose of paying the necessary expenses incurred in investigating the origin and causes of epidemic diseases in the United States; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) extending time for joint committee on transfer of Indian Bureau to report.

JURORS' OATH.

Mr. BECK. I ask for the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1505) to repeal sections 820 and 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. McMILLAN. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota objects.

Mr. BECK. I move, then, to suspend the pending and all prior orders and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the pending and all prior orders be suspended and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

An amendment was reported by the Committee on the Revision of the Laws to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and in lieu thereof to insert:

That section 820 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, repealed, saving the application of the same to all offenses committed prior to April 20, 1871, and all proceedings for prosecution of offenses pending on the said 20th day of April, 1871.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, having interposed once to prevent what seemed to me to be a hasty consideration of this bill, I do not feel called upon to persist in contending with it. I rise, however, to suggest to the Senator from Kentucky, if it be he who more especially than any other Senator has it in charge, that there should be made, and I hope he will make, a statement showing either that the act became by inadvertence a section in the Revised Statutes, or that for some other reason it should be stricken out.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, the other day when I urged the immediate consideration of this bill I did it upon the ground that section 820 of the Revised Statutes was incorporated by inadvertence into the Revised Statutes, and was not in fact the law of the land; that all its provisions had been repealed by the act of April 20, 1871, in express terms; that is, that the first section of the act of June 17, 1862, which is in substance and almost verbatim identical with the language of section 820 of the Revised Statutes, had been repealed by the act of April 20, 1871, and therefore was improperly incorporated into the Revised Statutes. In order to secure for the examination into the truth of that statement full consideration I consented to the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. They considered the question and yesterday reported the bill back unanimously, or rather reported the substitute now offered for the bill that I introduced; this substitute is the proposition now pending. I understand that the committee were unanimously of the opinion that section 820 was repealed by the law of 1871 and was inadvertently placed in the Revised Statutes, and they so reported yesterday morning. For that reason I call up the bill now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I offer the following additional section:

SEC. 2. That section 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. CONKLING. What is that section?

Mr. BECK. I will read section 820 and then section 821, as I believe that it is simply a portion of section 820, and that the repeal of section 820 necessitates the repeal of section 821, because the oath authorized by section 821 to be required of jurors cannot possibly apply to any other persons than those who, before the repeal of section 820, were not eligible as jurors, and is only a means of testing their eligibility, and of punishing them for falsely assuming that they were not excluded by section 820, when they cannot be excluded even if they have done all that section 820 excluded them for; the oath prescribed by section 821 is simply an absurdity, because they cannot be excluded from the jury even if they cannot take the oath when section 820 is repealed. To make this clear I propose to read the section. Section 820 reads as follows:

The following shall be causes of disqualification and challenge of grand and petit jurors in the courts of the United States, in addition to the causes existing by virtue of section 812, namely: without duress and coercion to have taken up arms or to have joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States; to have adhered to any insurrection or rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; to have given, directly or indirectly, any assistance in money, arms, horses, clothes, or anything whatever, to or for the use or benefit of any person whom the giver of such assistance knew to have joined, or to be about to join, any insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States, or whom he had good ground to believe to have joined, or to be about to join, any insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; or to have counseled or advised any person to join any insurrection or rebellion, or to resist with force of arms the laws of the United States.

That is the section which the Committee of the Whole have agreed to repeal as it was repealed in 1871. Section 821, which I now propose by my amendment to have repealed, reads thus:

SEC. 821. At every term of any court of the United States the district attorney, or other person acting on behalf of the United States in said court, may move, and the court, in their discretion, may require the clerk to tender to every person summoned to serve as a grand or petit juror, or veniremen, or talesman, in said court, the following oath or affirmation, namely: "You do solemnly swear (or affirm) that you will support the Constitution of the United States of America; that you have not, without duress and constraint, taken up arms or joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States; that you have not adhered to any insurrection or rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; that you have not, directly or indirectly, given any assistance in money, or any other thing, to any person or persons whom you knew, or had good ground to believe, to have joined, or to be about to join, said insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; and that you have not counseled or advised any person to join any insurrection or rebellion against, or to resist with force of arms, the laws of the United States." Any person declining to take said oath shall be discharged by the court from serving on the grand or petit jury, or venire, to which he may have been summoned.

Regarding the last section simply as being a means of testing the standing of the jurors as prescribed in section 820, I think its repeal necessarily follows, and that its repeal ought to be a part of the law repealing the first section. It seems to me that the statement of the case exhausts the argument.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I see the honorable Senator from Michigan is present—I mean the chairman of the committee from which this report, said to be unanimous, came—and therefore when I see that his attention is attracted to the subject, I will give place to him. Meanwhile, however, I venture to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the report of the committee being unanimous was to the effect, not that this section ought to be repealed, but that the other section upon which a vote has been taken should be repealed. I have, of course, no mode of knowing, until we hear, why the committee unanimously selected, not this section but another section to be repealed and this section to stand unrepealed. I observe, however, from the reading of the Senator, and now from the book, that this section reposes in the court a power wholly discretionary. It is to the effect that at every term of any court of the United States the district attorney or other person acting on behalf of the United States in said court, may move and the court in their discretion may require this oath to be administered. It is therefore a section clothing the court with jurisdiction to entertain such a motion which motion must arise in the discretion of the prosecuting officer, and upon the motion, sifting the particular case, the court in its discretion may direct or refuse to direct as the motion proposes.

Now, I can readily see not one reason merely but various reasons why the Committee on the Revision of the Laws held, if it did hold, first that this section was not to be treated in pari materia with the other, why this section was not to fall necessarily though the other should fall, and why this section maintaining a discretion should not be stricken out. I can understand how without going counter to the policy which the Senator from Kentucky would advocate in this regard, the discretion might well be applicable to a case in which the Senator himself would hold that the ground was a good one on which to discharge a juror. For example, suppose the particular issue to be tried, as far as the word "trial" applies to a grand jury, suppose the question to be considered in the secret cloisters of a grand jury were a question addressed especially to the acts, the standing, the history of a man in respect of these very matters recited in the section. I can readily see that the court in its discretion might say, "although this juror objected to ought to sit in an ordinary case and there would be no objection to him, he should not sit in this case." It was long a rule in England that members of certain trades, no matter who they were, should not be allowed to sit in capital causes. I do not name them; every lawyer will remember them. It was not an arbitrary provision; it was founded deep in philosophy in the philosophy of human nature. It is the law now that any man who has formed and expressed an opinion is to be excluded; any man who has upon his mind a bias which in the language of the law it would require evidence to remove, is disqualified as a juror. It is the law, the number varying in States, that peremptorily, without any ground being assigned at all, without a challenge for cause or a challenge for favor or a challenge to the array, merely because he please a party may say, not that one juror only but that a considerable number of jurors—the number is larger in some States and smaller in others—shall not sit merely because he chooses that they shall not sit.

Now, possibly, without this section a challenge to a petit juror to the favor or for cause, to be determined by the court or by triers, might set aside a juror intended by this section; I do not know how that is; but when you come to the case of a grand juror, who is to challenge a grand juror under the practice of most, if not all the States? A challenge to the array, a challenge on the ground that the venire was defective may set aside an entire panel; but who is to challenge a particular grand juror at a particular term of the court? I do not know. I do not understand the convenient process by which that might be reached. Here is a section which confers upon the district attorney the power to present to the court, and upon the court the power to determine, the point whether a particular juror having sustained certain relations, having been surrounded by certain influences, having avowed certain proclivities, should or should not sit in what may be called the star-chamber ex parte proceeding of a grand jury to adjudge a man who may have held antagonistic relations in the same regard.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Michigan has learned from me at this moment for the first time, he having been for a while out of the Chamber, that the pending motion before the Senate is to add to this bill another section repealing a different provision of the Revised Statutes, and but for my rising the Senate was about to vote on that question; and to that question I hope some attention will be addressed, if I am right in a cursory view as to the merits of this amendment.

The Senator from Michigan tells me also that a proposition to repeal section 821 is now pending, and pending separately, before the Judiciary Committee, is not before the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and was not before that committee. So it seems that as to this section we are about to proceed without any report from any committee. The honorable Senator corrects me now by saying that it was before them by a bill, but by their determination it was not before them, and because they thought it did not fall within the idea of revising the laws; it brought up a broader question than that, and did not pertain to their jurisdiction, and therefore they refrained from dealing with it and refused to include it in the bill which they reported, and also for the reason that it was before the Judiciary Committee. For all these reasons now presented it is proposed that this morning in the Senate, without the report of any committee, the Senate shall expunge this section.

I do not wish to repeat some remarks I made before the chairman of the Judiciary Committee came in; I see he is now in his seat; but I will so far repeat as to endeavor to invite his attention to the fact that the section of the Revised Statutes now in question is one which excludes no juror, which requires no oath, which is mandatory and exacting in no sense, but which simply invests the district attorney or prosecuting officer with the power to address to the discretion of the court a motion aimed at a particular juror, and enables the court in deciding that motion to say whether that juror in respect of the reasons here referred to should or should not sit as a member of the grand jury in the investigations of that particular term, or should or should not sit as a member of the trial jury to determine issues there pending. I do not think it falls within the reason assigned against the other section, nor do I think that if repealed it should be repealed for parallel reasons or that in any sense it should necessarily share the fate of the other section.

If the preceding section is repealed the oath is dispensed with, except that by this section as it stands it will still be in the power of the court in a given case presented to its discretion to direct that a juror, unless he can take this oath, shall not sit at the particular term, or in the particular case in which, if I may so say, that juror is challenged. That is all. I doubt whether any Senator is prepared to say, I am not, how the repeal of this section would leave the law or the practice of the courts. It might still be true that it would be a good challenge for cause or to the favor in the case of a petit juror that the things here specified had been true of him; because the court or the triers passing upon that challenge might hold that bias or prejudice or disqualification of some sort as to that particular case might be inferred from the facts. I do not know how that would be. I know how it would be in my own State; I do not know how it would be under the practice in the other States. Here is a section which makes it certain in all the States, and certain, as it seems to me, only to an extent consistent with the safety and the rights of all parties. Certainly if a man were to be tried on an issue which gave rise sharply and distinctly to the very prejudice indicated here, there should be some mode of saying that he ought not to be tried by a man whose history and position and the state of whose mind was such as to lead him to be violent in that regard. But, as I have said, I have no disposition to occupy the time of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I voted to take up this bill understanding that it was a bill concerning which the committee to whom it had been referred were unanimous, and understanding that it was required simply to correct a clear and admitted mistake in the revision of the statutes. I should not have voted to take it up if I had supposed that when it came up an amendment relating to matters in dispute would be proposed, though of course it was entirely in order to make that proposition. It is quite clear that the bill cannot be passed to-day, at present. The morning hour has now expired, and at the expiration of the morning hour the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] is on the floor to conclude his remarks on the patent laws.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not so understand.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. That subject is fixed by special order for the 7th of January.

Mr. HOAR. On that point, then, I was misinformed; but at any rate it is not possible that any disputed matter of legislation in relation to this bill would pass the House before the holidays; so that the ultimate passage of the bill will not be hastened by an attempt to deal with it in the Senate to-day. The Senate is quite thin, and will be thinner before long. I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Senator to withdraw that to allow us to have a short executive session.

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to that. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE LEONARD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That 8,000 copies of the eulogies delivered in the House of Representatives and to be delivered in the Senate upon the late J. E. Leonard, late member of this House from the fifth district of Louisiana, be printed; 6,000 for the use of the House, and 2,000 for the use of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 5534) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. TELLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5281) to establish post-routes herein named; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. WINDOM. By request, and without knowing anything whatever of the claim, I ask for the following order:

Ordered, That the papers relating to the claim of Willis N. Arnold, of Tennessee, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order will be granted upon the condition imposed by the rules.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BECK. I desire the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McDONALD, (when his name was called.) I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MATTHEWS.] As this vote seems to be taking a political direction I shall decline to vote. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] on all political questions. As his colleague thinks this is a political question, I shall withhold my vote on the subject. He would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea," if he were here.

Mr. MITCHELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD.] If he were here, I presume he would vote "nay." I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ARMSTRONG, (after having voted in the negative.) I had promised to pair with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. OGLESBY.] I find he left town last night. I wish, therefore, to withdraw my vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri withdraws his vote.

Mr. DORSEY, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] on all political questions. I did not suppose when I voted that this was such a question, but I find it is so considered and I ask to withdraw my vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas withdraws his vote.

The result was announced, as follows:

The Sergeant-at-Arms will close the doors and clear the galleries of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to state that on this particular question the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. BARNUM.]

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 992) for the relief of Columbus F. Perry and Elizabeth H. Gilmer, of Chambers County, Alabama;

A bill (S. No. 347) to remove the political disabilities of Manning M. Kimmell, late of Cape Girardeau County, Missouri;

A bill (S. No. 88) for the relief of James W. Richard and J. S. Brown & Brother, of Denver, Colorado; and

A bill (S. No. 986) for the relief of William S. Morris, William S. Mann, Charles A. Oakman, George W. Hillman, the Union Transfer Company, all of Philadelphia; the Union Transfer Company of Baltimore, Maryland, and John R. Graham, late of Philadelphia, now of Washington, District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1244) for the relief of George Williams with amendments in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

GEORGE WILLIAMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 1244) for the relief of George Williams.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senate will concur in the amendments of the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments will be reported.

The SECRETARY. In line 8 of the bill strike out the words "said Williams" and insert the words "the legal representatives of said George Williams, deceased," and amend the title so as to read: "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of George Williams, deceased."

Mr. McMILLAN. I should like to have the bill read at length.

Mr. MORGAN. It is a bill that passed the Senate at the last session. Since the passage of the bill by the Senate the party for whose benefit the bill was enacted has died. The only change made by the House is to substitute the legal representatives for himself.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota desire to have the bill read at length?

Mr. McMILLAN. I withdraw my request.

The amendments of the House of Representatives were concurred in.

JURORS' OATH.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1505) to repeal sections 820 and 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. BECK. I desire to withdraw the amendment which I offered to the substitute reported from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky withdraws the amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to repeal section 820 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to jurors in criminal cases."

Mr. CONKLING, (at two o'clock p. m.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate stands adjourned until Tuesday, January 7th next, at twelve o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 20, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

Prayer by the Rev. A. F. MASON, pastor Calvary Baptist church, Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE JUDGE LEONARD.

Mr. ACKLEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution for the printing of the eulogies on the late Judge Leonard, of Louisiana. I wish to say that unless this resolution is adopted before the holiday recess members who are not elected to the Forty-sixth Congress will not receive their quota of these eulogies, and that is the reason why I wish to have the resolution offered and adopted now.

Mr. DUNNELL. I should like to say that I understand the eulogies on the late Judge Leonard have not yet been pronounced in the Senate and the presumption is they will be, and therefore I think this resolution is premature.

Mr. ACKLEN. I ask that the resolution be read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That 8,000 copies of the eulogies delivered in the House of Representatives on the late J. E. Leonard, member of Congress from the fifth district of Louisiana, be printed; 6,000 for the use of the House and 2,000 for the use of the Senate.

Mr. ACKLEN. I move to amend the resolution by inserting the words "and to be delivered in the Senate," which will cover the gentleman's objection.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that bills be presented for reference as of Monday morning. I think it will be simplified if, by unanimous consent, the Speaker be allowed to recognize gentlemen for the introduction of bills for reference as of Monday morning.

Mr. BRIGHT. I hope it will not be restricted to that alone.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let that be done first of all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio? When the House, after the recess, resumes its session it will be on January 7th, so that on Monday the 6th there will be no session of the House and no opportunity during that week under the rules to introduce bills for reference.

Mr. WILSON. Let unanimous consent also embrace the introduction of resolutions to be considered by consent.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I object to that enlargement.

Mr. BLOUNT. My colleague objects to reports of committees.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio that bills and joint resolutions be introduced for reference?

Mr. WILSON. I desire to have the order large enough to embrace reports.

The SPEAKER. It does not embrace reports.

Mr. WILSON. Then I object.

Mr. HOOKER. I hope it will embrace resolutions to be offered for reference.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again submit the proposition. Is there objection to granting unanimous consent to the recognition of members for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference?

Mr. FINLEY. I suggest that the States be called.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask the unanimous consent be so enlarged as to embrace resolutions.

The SPEAKER. There has been objection to the enlargement of the order.

Mr. HOOKER. Then I object to the whole proposition.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a message from the Senate of the United States, and also move agreement in the request of the Senate for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 5312) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic services for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. DUNNELL. Have the amendments of the Senate been acted upon by the House? Have they been before the House?

Mr. SINGLETON. They have been, and the gentleman will find them in print.

There was no objection, and Mr. SINGLETON's motion was agreed to.

INVALID PENSION BILL.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, moved to take from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5501) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1880, and moved their reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty minutes past twelve o'clock.

Mr. WHITE. I suggest this day's session be devoted to the consideration of private bills to which there are no objections.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I will renew the suggestion after the morning hour.

Mr. CHALMERS. I desire to make a report from the Committee of Accounts for the payment of a clerk who cannot get his money otherwise. He should get his money before Christmas, and I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I withdraw the demand for the regular order for that purpose.

Mr. PAGE. I insist on the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the morning hour begins at twenty-one minutes past twelve o'clock, and reports from committees of a private nature are in order. The call rests with the Committee of Claims.

GEORGE WILLIAMS.

Mr. BRIGHT. The Committee of Claims have had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4412) for the relief of George Williams, and have directed me to report the same with a favorable recommendation. I ask at the same time the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 1244, which is identical with the House bill and upon which there is a favorable report, that it may be considered by the House as a substitute for the House bill, the House bill being laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill (S. No. 1244) was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to adjust and settle, upon just and equitable terms, the claim of George Williams for balance due for building locks 2, 3, and 4 of Muscle Shoals Canal on Tennessee River, and on a contract for section-work, done under power of attorney from Matthew G. Kennedy: Provided, That in making said settlement the said Secretary of War shall not allow the said Williams more than his actual expenditures, with reasonable compensation for the use of tools, and for money advanced in the prosecution of said work: And provided further, That no allowance or payment shall be made under this act except in pursuance of a recommendation of a board of not less than three engineers, to be appointed by the Secretary of War to inquire into and report upon the character and value of the work done and the merits of the claim.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the substitution of the Senate bill which the gentleman from Tennessee states is a literal copy of what the House committee has reported favorably. The Senate bill is before the House, and will be considered as having been read a first and second time.

Mr. BRIGHT. I offer the following amendment:

In line 10 strike out the words "said Williams" and insert "legal representatives of said George Williams, deceased."

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that since the passage of the Senate bill the George Williams mentioned therein has died.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I would like to hear the report read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred House bill No. 4412 for the relief of George Williams, have had the same under consideration and would respectfully report:

This claim for relief arises out of work done on the Muscle Shoals Canal, Tennessee River, in the State of Alabama, in building certain locks and certain section work under contracts with the United States.

Without going into details, it is sufficient for the committee to state that the claim is based upon the following facts alleged by the claimant and well sustained by the proof he submits:

First. That the claimant in making bids for work upon said canal and section work was, without any fault upon his part, misled as to the real character of the work to be done; no detailed plans had been prepared by the engineer in charge at the time of the letting, and the claimant was shown the plan of a lock at Des Moines Rapids Canal at Keokuk, Iowa, and was informed that these locks would be similar in many respects, whereas, when said plans were furnished, they proved in nearly every respect different from the plan of the Des Moines locks and very much more expensive.

Second. That after the contracts were entered into, the work was materially and radically changed by order of the engineer in charge, whereby the contractor was put to great additional expense and suffered serious loss.

Third. That claimant was not permitted to commence work at the time specified in the contract for lock work, whereby he suffered loss. The contract required the work to be commenced on May 1, 1876, and the contractor was on the ground and ready to commence work on May 4, 1876, but was not furnished any plans until September, 1876, and the final plan until April, 1877.

Fourth. That certain expensive masonry work not required by the specifications was made necessary by the alterations of plans, as was also a material change in the foundations and an increase of the height of the chamber walls of the locks; all of which the contractor did under order of the engineer and at great additional expense. The contract provides that no extra work or material shall be paid for unless such extra work on materials shall have been expressly required in writing by the Government officers in charge of the work. When certain extra work and materials were discovered to be necessary, the claimant called the attention of the United States engineer in charge of the work to the fact, and asked for a modification of the contract so as to cover the extra expense found necessary. No change in the contract was made, but in lieu of such proposed change the engineer in charge suggested a submission of the whole question to disinterested experts or arbitrators, and to this the claimant acceded. While this cannot be taken in law as a change of the contract, yet as it was so considered by the claimant and the engineer in charge, and as it is understood by the committee that the Secretary of War is satisfied with a settlement of this claim upon a basis similar to the one agreed upon by the claimant and the engineer in charge, your committee have, by the bill reported, provided for such settlement.

Fifth. By reason of the facts above stated the claimant, who has done his work faithfully, has actually paid out in its prosecution largely more money than he has received as compensation.

Your committee have not undertaken to determine what sum the claimant should receive in full compensation for his damages, but it is submitted that the Secretary of War may with great propriety be authorized to settle the claim, upon just and equitable terms, by allowing the claimant not more than his actual expenditures, with a reasonable compensation for the use of his tools and for money advanced in the prosecution of the work, no allowance to be made except in pursuance of the recommendation of a board of engineers, to be appointed by said Secretary, to inquire into and report upon the character and value of the work and the merits of the claim. More than this the claimant might perhaps with justice ask, but less the Government cannot afford to compel him to accept.

The committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill as a substitute for the original bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRIGHT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGHT. I ask that the title of the bill be amended so that it shall read: "A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of George Williams, deceased."

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

RICHARD T. BRYAN.

Mr. CUMMINGS, from the Committee of Claims, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 2882, a bill (H. R. No. 5713) granting $2,000 to Richard T. Bryan, as compensation; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

G. E. W. SHARRETTS.

Mr. CUMMINGS also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 3159, a bill (H. R. No. 5714) granting $2,000 to G. E. W. Sharretts, as compensation; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

THOMAS A. M'LAUGHLIN.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee of Claims, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 939) for the relief of Thomas A. McLaughlin; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHARLES B. ROBERTS.

Mr. HENDERSON also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5715) for the relief of Charles B. Roberts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES W. RICHARD AND OTHERS.

Mr. HENDERSON. I also report back from the Committee of Claims, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 88) for the relief of James W. Richard and J. S. Brown & Brother, of Denver, Colorado, and ask for its present consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be appropriated the sum of $5,004, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to pay James W. Richard and J. S. Brown & Brother, of the city of Denver, county of Arapahoe, in the State of Colorado, for flour delivered by said last-named parties to the Los Pinos Indian agency in Colorado during the year 1875; that the same be paid under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CLYMER. I make the point of order that that bill makes an appropriation and should go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to let the report be read before he insists on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read, the Chair reserving the right of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 88) for the relief of James W. Richard and J. S. Brown & Brother, of Denver, Colorado, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report:

That the committee find the facts as to the claim of the said James W. Richard and J. S. Brown & Brother correctly stated in the Senate report from the Committee on Indian Affairs, No. 242, which said report is hereto annexed and made part of this report; and is in the words and figures following, to wit:

"The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 88) for the relief of James W. Richard and J. S. Brown & Brother, of Denver, Colorado, report:

"That the testimony in the case shows that H. F. Bond, United States Indian agent for the Los Pinos agency in Colorado, entered into a contract with the firm of J. W. Richard & Co., of Denver, Colorado, for the purchase from said Richard & Co. of 100,000 pounds of flour, to be delivered by said firm to the new agency located in the Uncompahgre Valley, on or before the 25th of December, 1875, at the price of $11.95 per one hundred pounds; that prior to said agreement with said firm the said Indian agent had advertised for bids for furnishing said flour, according to the regulations of the Indian Bureau, and received under such notice two bids—one to furnish said quantity of flour at $9.50 per hundred pounds and the other to furnish it at $8.50 per hundred pounds, but that subsequently both of said offers of contract were forfeited by the parties making the same. Thereupon said agent claims that he was forced to go into the market at Denver and offer to purchase the flour, and that said Richard & Co. made the lowest bid to furnish the same at the point first stated in this report. The evidence further shows that Richard & Co. delivered all of said flour at what is known as the "old agency," about ninety miles nearer the city of Denver than the Los Pinos agency, the point at which the flour was to have been delivered under the contract. Notice of this contract with Richard & Co. having been furnished to the Indian Department, the Commissioner refused to confirm the same, and notified the Indian agent and Richard & Co. of the fact.

"In the mean time, however, the agent had issued to the Indians of the Los Pinos agency 62,800 pounds of said flour. The remaining 37,200, or 372 sacks, were, by the agent, returned to and accepted by the said J. W. Richard & Co. Afterward said firm of Richard & Co. agreed to accept from the Indian department, in payment in discharge of said 62,800 pounds distributed to the Indians as aforesaid, eight cents per pound. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs accepted these terms, and agreed that the amount should be recognized by the Department as a just claim for the amount of flour furnished in quantity and quality as set out in the contract.

"The committee herewith inclose communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs upon this subject, dated February 15, 1877, addressed to Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON, United States Senate; and a further communication, dated February 22, 1878, from B. A. Hayt, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, addressed to Hon. H. M. TELLER, of the Senate, upon this subject, in which communication the Indian Bureau recognizes the justness of the claim and recommends its payment.

"But as said contract was not made in accordance with the regulations of the Indian Bureau, the amount cannot be paid out of the regular appropriation for such purpose; a special act of Congress is deemed necessary in order to furnish the same.

"The bill provides for an appropriation of $5,004; the sum admitted to be due by the Indian Bureau is $5,024.

"The Committee on Indian Affairs have amended the bill accordingly, and, as amended, recommend its passage."

The committee therefore adopt said Senate report as the report of this committee and make it their own, and the committee are of the opinion that said claim is just, and should be paid, and they therefore report back said Senate bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. CLYMER. I do not insist on the point of order.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 5682) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for transportation of mails by railroads for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879;

A bill (H. R. No. 5683) to amend an act approved June 20, 1878, and to fix the rate of interest on bonds authorized by said act, to be issued by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 210) making an appropriation for the purpose of paying the necessary expenses incurred in investigating the origin and causes of epidemic diseases in the United States; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) extending time for Joint Committee on Transfer of Indian Bureau to report.

W. S. MORRIS AND OTHERS.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 986) for the relief of William S. Morris, William S. Mann, Charles A. Oakman, George W. Hillman, the Union Transfer Company, all of Philadelphia, the Union Transfer Company of Baltimore, Maryland, and John R. Graham, late of Philadelphia, now of Washington, District of Columbia.

The bill was read.

Mr. THOMPSON. I make the point of order on that bill that it must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole. I do it because it is unfair to other committees who desire to make reports with a view to putting them on the Private Calendar that the time should be occupied in the consideration of bills as soon as reported.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the gentleman allow the report to be read?

Mr. THOMPSON. It will only be consuming time unnecessarily, for I shall not withdraw the objection.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIM OF THE STATE OF TENNESSEE.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 882) authorizing the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to audit and pay the claim of the State of Tennessee for keeping United States military prisoners.

The bill was read. It authorizes the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to audit, and when audited to pay, the amount due the State of Tennessee, if any amount is found due, for the keeping and maintaining of United States military prisoners.

The report was read; from which it appears that the State of Tennessee has a claim against the United States for keeping military prisoners from July 1, 1863, to December 31, 1871, amounting to $30,006.81; that if the claim had been presented from time to time as it accrued, it would have been payable from the appropriation for contingencies of the Army, except a small portion which accrued since July 1, 1871, but that there is now no appropriation available for its payment, and that the office of the Second Auditor of the Treasury Department can take no further action in the case until Congress has made some provision for its payment.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed the following concurrent resolutions of the House, with amendments in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

Resolution to print 3,000 copies of the Geographical and Geological Surveys of the Rocky Mountain Region, in quarto form; and Resolution to print 3,000 copies of the report of the Geological and Geographical Surveys of the Rocky Mountain Region relating to the geology of the high plateaus of Utah, in quarto form, with the necessary illustrations and chart.

DOUGHTY & CARD.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 1066) for the relief of Doughty & Card; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calandar, and ordered to be printed.

L. MADISON DAY.

Mr. REILLY, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5716) for the relief of L. Madison Day; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

COLONEL ALFRED B. MEACHAM.

Mr. REILLY, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3357) for the relief of Colonel Alfred B. Meacham; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

W. S. MORRIS AND OTHERS.

Mr. HENDERSON. In regard to the Senate bill No. 986, to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THOMPSON] objected, I wish to say that it simply provides that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall reopen and investigate certain claims for taxes alleged to have been illegally assessed and collected.

The committee have carefully considered the bill, and the report fully states all the facts. I therefore ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his objection on the point of order and let it be considered now.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not antagonize the bill. I know nothing about its merits, but I make the point of order in justice to the rest of the committee, who are deprived of their rights under the rule by this courtesy which has become nearly unbearable.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is the only time I have asked anything of the sort.

Mr. THOMPSON. That may be all true, but we must begin somewhere; and therefore I stand by my objection.

Subsequently,

Mr. THOMPSON withdrew his objection, and the bill was read, as follows:

That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reopen and reconsider the following claims for the refunding of certain taxes, alleged to have been improperly and illegally assessed and collected, namely: William S. Morris, for the amount of $3,690.22; William S. Mann, for the amount of $572.66; Charles A. Oakman, for the amount of $1,453.20; George W. Hillman, for the amount of $200; the Union Transfer Company of Philadelphia, for the amount of $5,055.50; the Union Transfer Company of Baltimore, Maryland, for the amount of $974.07, and John R. Graham, for the amount of $1,744.68, as claimed by them, respectively, in the papers now on file in the Treasury Department. And if, upon reopening and reconsidering said claims, said Commissioner shall find said taxes, or any part of the same, to have been illegally or improperly assessed and collected from said claimants, it is hereby made his duty to audit and ascertain the amount of taxes so illegally and improperly collected from each of said claimants, deducting, however, any legal unpaid taxes which claimants should have paid, and did not, if any there shall be, under section 103 of the act of June 30, 1864, entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes." And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the several amounts of taxes so found by said Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as aforesaid, to have been illegally and improperly assessed and collected, to the persons and companies hereinbefore named, respectively.

Mr. HENDERSON. This bill has passed the Senate and the House at one time or another for several years.

There being no further objection, the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLUMBUS F. PERRY AND ELIZABETH GILMER.

Mr. REILLY. I ask to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 992, for the relief of Columbus F. Perry and Elizabeth H. Gilmer, of Chambers County, Alabama.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the request under instruction from the committee?

Mr. REILLY. No, sir; I am not instructed by the committee.

The SPEAKER. This is the hour for reports from committees.

Mr. REILLY. Well, the Committee of Claims have already reported a bill of the same character.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman had better report that bill, and then substitute the Senate bill for it, in the same manner as was done this morning in another case.

Mr. REILLY. That is what I want to do. I move that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3624) for the relief of Columbus F. Perry and Elizabeth Gilmer, and that the Senate bill be taken from the Speaker's table and substituted therefor.

The Senate bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the said Columbus F. Perry and Elizabeth H. Gilmer be, and they are hereby, authorized to refile their claim before the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for refunding the tax known as succession tax, which was erroneously and illegally assessed and collected of them by John C. Hendrix, assistant assessor, and Fr. Widmer, collector for the second district of Alabama, under section 132 of the act of 1864, the amount being the sum of $4,440; and said Commissioner is hereby required to hear and determine said claim, notwithstanding the bar of the statute of limitations in such cases: Provided, Said claim shall be propounded within three months from the approval of this act.

Mr. REILLY. I desire to state that the Senate bill is precisely the same as the House bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Is there a report in this case?

Mr. REILLY. There is a brief report to accompany the House bill, and I ask that the same be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill H. R. No. 3624, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

On the 18th day of June, A. D. 1866, Elizabeth H. Gilmer, one of the petitioners, executed to Columbus F. Perry, the other petitioner, a deed of gift of certain real estate situated in Montgomery County, Alabama, which deed was filed in the probate court of said county on the same day. The conveyance of said property in this manner gave rise to dissatisfaction and created some contention among the relatives of said Elizabeth H. Gilmer, and to quiet the same the said Columbus F. Perry, on the 2d day of October, A. D. 1866, executed a deed of release of said property to said Elizabeth H. Gilmer. In neither case was there any money consideration. Said conveyances were, however, assessed with the tax imposed by the act of 1864, known as the internal-revenue tax. The tax was assessed under the provisions of said act regulating succession to real estate. The amount on each conveyance was $2,220, which amount was paid by each of said parties to the United States under duress, as alleged by them. Petitioners subsequently applied for relief to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, but their application was rejected because the time for making it had expired by limitation, namely, on the 6th June, 1863. The bill under consideration provides that said parties be allowed to refile their claim before the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and authorizes that officer to hear and determine the same. It does not appear that said parties are guilty of any laches, and without expressing any opinion as to the merits of said application, the committee regard the said bill as a proper one under the facts of the case, and therefore recommend its passage, with an amendment, as follows: In line 6, strike out the word "was," and insert after the word "which," in said line, the words "is alleged to have been."

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I think this Senate bill had better go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REILLY. I hope my colleague [Mr. WHITE] will not insist upon that. The bill makes no appropriation, simply authorizes the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to consider this case, and if he decides that under the law these parties have no right to any money they can recover none. The bill passed the Senate and is unanimously recommended by the Committee of Claims of the House.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I will withdraw my objection.

No further objection being made, the bill (S. No. 992) for the relief of Columbus F. Perry and Elizabeth H. Gilmer, of Chambers County, Alabama, was taken from the Speaker's table, read three several times, and passed.

Mr. REILLY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 3524, for the relief of Columbus F. Perry and Elizabeth H. Gilmore; and the same was laid on the table.

SCHOONER-YACHT ZINGA.

Mr. DUNNELL, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, House bill No. 3878, to provide for the change of name of the American built and owned schooner-yacht Zinga.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to allow the owner of the schooner-yacht Zinga to change her name to Jennie L. Currie.

Mr. DUNNELL. I will state merely that this yacht has been entirely remodeled and refitted, and is now in first-class condition.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PORTSMOUTH, OHIO.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, House bill No. 2292, to constitute the city of Portsmouth, in the State of Ohio, a port of delivery.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the city of Portsmouth, in the State of Ohio, shall be, and is hereby, constituted a port of delivery within the collection district of New Orleans, and shall be subject to the same regulations and restrictions as other ports of delivery in the United States; and all the privileges and facilities afforded by the act of Congress of the 2d of March, A. D. 1831, entitled "An act allowing the duties on foreign merchandise imported into Pittsburgh, Wheeling, Cincinnati, Louisville, Saint Louis, Nashville, and Natchez, to be secured and paid at those places," shall be extended to said port. A surveyor of customs shall be appointed to reside at said port, and perform the duties prescribed by law, who shall receive such compensation now provided or which may hereafter be provided by law for surveyors of the same grade.

Mr. KENNA. There are many reasons why this bill should pass, and the Committee on Commerce have unanimously directed me to ask for its consideration at this time. It is indorsed by the Treasury Department as necessary.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KENNA moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. KNOTT. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back, with a favorable recommendation, sundry bills for the removal of political disabilities. I will state that in each case there is the usual petition.

The SPEAKER. The bills will be read, and if there be no objection they will be considered at this time.

JOHN M'INTOSH KELL.

Mr. KNOTT accordingly, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 5333) for the removal of the political disabilities of John McIntosh Kell, of Georgia; which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting in the affirmative.

WILLIAM H. WARD.

Mr. KNOTT also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, a bill (H. R. No. 5373) to remove the political disabilities of William H. Ward, of Norfolk, Virginia; which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed, two-thirds voting in the affirmative.

MANNING M. KIMMELL.

Mr. KNOTT also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, a bill (S. No. 347) to remove the political disabilities of Manning M. Kimmell, late of Cape Girardeau County, Missouri; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

LOUISA M. MANSFIELD.

Mr. KNOTT. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back, with a favorable consideration, House bill No. 5507, for the relief of Louisa M. Mansfield, and to ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Louisa M. Mansfield, widow and executrix of the will of General Joseph K. F. Mansfield, who was killed at the battle of Antietam, September, 1862, be, and she is hereby, released and discharged from all claim or liability on, or on account of, a bond of Joseph M. Wade, as acting paymaster in the Navy, dated June 3, 1861, which bond was signed by her husband, the said General J. K. F. Mansfield, as one of the sureties, the other surety named on the face of said bond never having executed or signed the same; and the suit brought against said Louisa M. Mansfield, as executrix aforesaid, in February, 1876, about fourteen years after her husband's death, in the United States district court for the district of Connecticut, and the claim or judgment therein, for about $2,000, is hereby directed to be discharged and canceled by the proper officer, and the said Louisa M. Mansfield, as executrix, released and discharged from all claim or liability thereon.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. KNOTT. There is no written report. The petition accompanying the bill sets forth all the facts, and I can state them briefly if there is no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KNOTT. In 1861 General Mansfield, of the United States Army, signed his name as one of the sureties to a bond the principal in which was a man of the name of Wade, acting paymaster in the United States Navy. The face of the bond and other facts show that it was also to be signed by another surety of the name of Brown; but Brown never signed it. The bond was left in the Treasury of the United States. General Mansfield was killed at Antietam. Nothing was done in regard to the matter until fourteen years had elapsed. His widow, who is the executrix of his estate, is, I am informed, in limited circumstances.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Is there any default or forfeiture upon the bond?

Mr. KNOTT. Yes, sir; a suit has been instituted on the bond on account of the defalcation of the principal, Mr. Wade.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. What is the amount of the claim?

Mr. KNOTT. It will amount to something near $2,000. I hope there will be no objection to granting this relief to the widow of a gallant general of our Army who lost his life upon the battle-field. The committee were unanimously of opinion that in view of the great lapse of time since the bond was executed, as well as the circumstance that the bond is shown by its face to have been incomplete, this lady is equitably entitled to relief.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. As this is the case of the widow of a Union soldier, I make no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

JOHN HENDERSON.

Mr. BRIGHT. The bill (S. No. 796) for the relief of John Henderson was erroneously referred to the Committee of Claims. I ask unanimous consent that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be restored to its place on the Speaker's table.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the House go to business on the Speaker's table for the reference of bills, to which there is no objection.

The SPEAKER. There are very few bills on the Speaker's table. A large number were referred the other day.

Mr. CONGER. I thought it desirable that these references be made before the adjournment, so that the committees could get to work on these bills.

ACCOUNTS OF THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, transmitting a list of employés in the Clerk's office, and a report of contingent expenses of the House of Representatives from July 1, 1877 to June 30, 1878; which was referred to the Committee of Accounts, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, transmitting an inventory of property belonging to the United States in his possession, December 2, 1878; which was referred to the Committee of Accounts, and ordered to be printed.

TREASURY LOANS TO NATIONAL BANKS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair also lays before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in response to a resolution of the House of the 16th instant, asking whether there were any balances on loan account standing to the credit of the Treasury of the United States in any national banks on the 1st day of March, 1876, and on the first day of each succeeding month to and including the 1st day of January, 1879; and the names and locations of banks which held such balances with the amounts held by each on the respective dates indicated. If there be no objection this communication will be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Would it be in order to ask for the reading of this communication?

The SPEAKER. It would be.

The Clerk proceeded to read the document.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. In order to avoid reading the schedule annexed to the letter, I request that the Clerk be instructed to read the amount of the deposits in the First National Bank of New York City.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Let us have it all.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. All right; my suggestion was only designed to save time.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is it proposed to read the long table of figures accompanying this communication?

Mr. WILSON. Let it be printed.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. We want to hear it all unless my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] will consent that the list relating to the First National Bank be read separately.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Let us have it all.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. If any part is read, all had better be read; or let it all be printed in the RECORD. I do not ask that time be taken up in this way.

Mr. BRIGHT. I ask that the further reading be dispensed with and that the document be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will my colleague permit me to name the amount on deposit in the First National Bank of New York?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. It is not necessary to discuss this question now.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Can I have the floor for a few moments upon the report? Am I not entitled to the floor?

The SPEAKER. It is not usual to discuss executive communications upon their presentation in this way.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. All I want is that the country shall know that during the last six months there has been upon deposit in one single bank in the city of New York an average of over $30,000,000, upon which the Government has had no interest whatever. [Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the communication and the accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and printed; and will also be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The document is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 19, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of resolution of House of Representatives dated the 16th instant, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House, at the earliest day practicable after the close of the coming congressional recess, whether there were any balances on loan account in cover standing to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States in any national banks on the 1st day of March, 1876, and on the first of each succeeding month to and including the 1st of January, 1879, and the names and locations of the banks which held such balances and the amount held by each at the respective dates indicated."

And in reply to state that there were no balances on loan account standing to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States in any national bank from March, 1876, to January, 1878.

A complete list of national-bank depositories, with balances on loan account to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States held by each February 1, 1878, and on the first of each succeeding month to and including December 1, 1878, is herewith inclosed. The House will be duly advised in another communication of the balances on January 1, 1879, as soon as the returns from the respective banks shall have been received at the Department.

These banks have been designated from time to time under the provisions of the Department's circulars inviting all national banks of the United States to become financial agents of the Government and depositories of public money for the special purpose of receiving deposits on account of subscriptions to the funded loan, and they were permitted, upon proper security, to hold the amount of any subscriptions made or obtained by them, subject to the drafts or orders of the Department as occasion required for payment of called bonds matured.

Copies of Department's circulars on this subject, dated January 16, 1878, January 21, 1878, June 20, 1878, and August 1, 1878, respectively, are herewith inclosed.

No coin has been deposited with these banks or any of them by the Treasurer of the United States. These balances represent exclusively coin received for subscriptions made or obtained by the respective banks and left on deposit during the running of the ninety days required by law to be given for the payment of called bonds, partly to prevent the withdrawal of so large an amount from the channels of business and partly as an inducement to these banks to act efficiently in procuring subscriptions.

The very large balances reported as held by the First National Bank of New York were caused by the temporary deposits of the proceeds of the 4½ per cent. bonds sold through the syndicate, of which the bank was a member, and also by the very large subscriptions of that bank to the 4 per cent. loan.

The balances reported as due from the banks on loan account are, however, to some extent, nominal, the bonds furnished as security being largely made up of called bonds, which to all intents are a payment to their amount of the balance due, but cannot be credited to the bank until the bonds are carefully examined, the precise amount due on them ascertained, and certificate for the amount issued by the Treasurer.

It is proposed to continue the same mode of deposit in aid of the sale of the 4 per cent. bonds during the next year, and attention is called to the recommendation in the annual report for a discretionary shortening of the period now required for calls.

Very respectfully, JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Statement of balances on loan account, in coin, standing to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States in national banks on the 1st day of February, 1878, and on the first of each succeeding month, including December 1, 1878; there were no such balances on any dates mentioned in the House resolution of the 16th instant, other than those given below.

[The actual balances as shown by the Treasurer's books are given instead of the balances reported by the banks, which will explain differences between this and the former report, if any exist.]

OFFICE TREASURER UNITED STATES, December 19, 1878.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 16, 1878.

The Secretary of the Treasury hereby gives notice that, from the 26th instant, and until further notice, he will receive subscriptions for the 4 per cent. funded loan of the United States, in denominations as stated below, at par and accrued interest, in coin.

The bonds are redeemable July 1, 1907, and bear interest, payable quarterly, on the 1st day of January, April, July, and October of each year, and are exempt from the payment of taxes or duties to the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

The subscriptions may be made for coupon bonds of $50, $100, $500, and $1,000, and for registered bonds of $50, $100, $500, $1,000, $5,000, and $10,000.

Two per cent. of the purchase money must accompany the subscription; the remainder may be paid at the pleasure of the purchaser, either at time of subscription or within thirty days thereafter, with interest on the amount of the subscription, at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, to date of payment.

Upon the receipt of full payment, the bonds will be transmitted, free of charge, to the subscribers, and a commission of ¼ of 1 per cent. will be allowed upon the amount of subscriptions, but no commission will be paid upon any single subscription less than $1,000.

Forms of application will be furnished by the Treasurer at Washington, the assistant treasurers at Baltimore, Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, New Orleans, New York, Philadelphia, Saint Louis, and San Francisco, and by the national banks and bankers generally. The applications must specify the amount and denominations required, and, for registered bonds, the full name and post-office address of the person to whom the bonds shall be made payable.

The interest on the registered bonds will be paid by check, issued by the Treasurer of the United States, to the order of the holder, and mailed to his address. The check is payable on presentation, properly indorsed, at the offices of the Treasurer and assistant treasurers of the United States.

Payments for the bonds may be made in coin to the Treasurer of the United States at Washington, or assistant treasurers at Baltimore, Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, New Orleans, New York, Philadelphia, Saint Louis, and San Francisco.

To promote the convenience of subscribers, the Department will also receive, in lieu of coin, called bonds of the United States, coupons past due or maturing within thirty days, or gold certificates issued under the act of March 3, 1863, and national banks will be designated as depositories under the provisions of section 5153, Revised Statutes of the United States, to receive deposits on account of this loan, under regulations to be hereafter prescribed.

JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary of the Treasury.

CIRCULARS TO NATIONAL BANKS.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 21, 1878.

By virtue of the authority conferred by section 5153, Revised Statutes of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury will designate as a depository of public moneys any national bank that will comply with the terms and conditions of this circular-letter.

Under such designation the bank will be entitled to receive only deposits in coin on account of the 4 per cent. bonds sold under the popular subscription invited by the circular of this Department of date of the 16th instant.

The bonds subscribed for will be issued upon the receipt of a proper certificate from the bank stating that the coin has been deposited to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, but they will be held by the Department as security until other United States bonds of an equal amount are substituted in their stead or the coin deposited has been paid upon Treasury drafts.

The proper blank certificates will be furnished to the banks from time to time, as needed.

Banks desiring the authority conferred by this circular in advance of subscriptions may deposit United States bonds with the Treasury of the United States as security for deposits to be afterward made, and certificates of deposit in proper form and for the amount of bonds so deposited will be furnished to the bank for execution.

The regular transcript blanks for the Treasurer's general account will be used in reporting deposits made on account of this loan, and will be furnished on demand to any national bank becoming a depository under this order.

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., June 20, 1878.

The Secretary of the Treasury calls attention to the 4 per cent. funded loan of the United States now offered by this Department in denominations, namely, for coupon bonds of $50, $100, $500, and $1,000, and for registered bonds of $50, $100, $500, $1,000, $5,000, and $10,000, at par and accrued interest to date of subscription, in coin.

The bonds are redeemable July 1, 1907, and bear interest, payable quarterly, on the 1st day of January, April, July, and October of each year, and are exempt from the payment of taxes or duties to the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

Upon the receipt of full payment, the bonds will be transmitted, free of charge, to the subscribers, and a commission of ¼ of 1 per cent. will be allowed upon the amount of subscriptions. Commissions will be paid by check only, and will not be applied in payment of subscriptions.

All national banks are now invited to become financial agents of the Government and depositories of public moneys received on the sale of these bonds, upon complying with section 5153, Revised Statutes of the United States. All banks, bankers, and persons are invited to aid in placing these bonds, and can make their arrangements through national banks for the deposit of the purchase money of the bonds.

The proceeds of the sale of these bonds will, until further notice, be only used in the redemption of 5-20 6 per cent. bonds of the United States, under the refunding act.

As soon as the 4 per cent. bonds are paid for by certificates of deposit of such public depositories, or otherwise, a call will issue, maturing within ninety days, for the redemption of 6 per cent. bonds, and the money received for 4 per cent. bonds will remain on deposit until such call matures.

Payment for the bonds may be made in coin, coin certificates, certificates of deposit of Government depositories, called bonds, coupons maturing within thirty days, or in currency drafts on New York, in my favor, which will be received at the coin value thereof at the National Bank of Commerce, New York. Any payment in excess will be returned with the commission.

All coin and currency drafts on New York should be forwarded directly to this Department by subscribers, or their agents.

The favorable state of the money market induces the Secretary to press upon the people this loan by which they can obtain direct from the Government a national bond of the highest credit and sanction, exempt from taxes, and payable, principal and interest, in coin. Every citizen of the United States is interested in the success of this loan, as every sale of these bonds enables the Government to save one-third of the interest on an equal amount of outstanding debt to be redeemed. These bonds should be the storehouse for the savings of the people. No facility or advantage will be given to large subscribers. It is the interest of the public that the bonds be distributed in small sums among the largest number of our fellow-citizens.

Subscriptions to an amount equal to the bonds now redeemable would make an annual saving of $8,961,632, and such subscriptions can now be made without withdrawing from circulation any of the money of the people.

All blanks, or forms, or information needed, will be furnished by the Department without cost.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will lie on the table, the bill being before the Senate.

Mr. MATTHEWS. As the bill is under consideration and the memorial is very short, I should be glad to have it read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read, in the absence of objection.

The memorial was read, as follows:

To the honorable Senators and Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, recognizing man's right of property in that which he himself creates, and believing those creations of the intellect which conduce to the benefit of mankind to be property of at least equal importance with the products of mere manual labor, and entitled to equal protection under the law; and believing also that the substantial prosperity of our country is largely, if not chiefly, due to the genius of her inventors and the fostering influence of her patent system, do most earnestly protest against legislation tending to deprive the inventor of that encouragement which lies in his constitutional guarantee of protection in the right of property existing in his invention, or which tends to impose upon him burdens and limitations not shared by holders of other property.

We do in particular respectfully protest against the passage of Senate bill No. 300, popularly known as the "Wadleigh bill," fully believing that its general object would be little better than to legalize gross injustice against a class to whom we owe much of our greatness as a government and prosperity as a people, and tend to discourage and repress that creative mechanical genius that has at length enabled the American manufacturer, and for the first time in our history as a people, to compete in the markets of the world with the skilled artisans of older nations.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I present the petition of Fire, chief, and 108 others, members of the Omaha tribe of Indians, praying for legal protection in all their rights to lands and property, and also protesting against the transfer of the management of their affairs to the War Department. There are two important questions embraced in this paper, one of which it would seem ought to go to the Committee on Indian Affairs and the other to the Judiciary Committee. I think I ought to have it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary at present, and I move its reference to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of Isaac Vansant, of Lexington County, South Carolina, praying for an increase of pension for services rendered and injury received in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Gabriel J. Rains, of South Carolina, praying for the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the petition of Mrs. William Ballard and 115 other women, of Boisé City, Idaho Territory; the petition of Mary E. Barry and 61 other women of Idaho Territory, and the petition of Mrs. W. A. Smick and 16 other women of Roseburgh, Oregon, praying for the passage of an act making effective the anti-polygamy law of 1862; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of William W. Ross, of Sparta, Oregon, praying to be relieved from liability for moneys, stamps, and envelopes that were in his possession as postmaster and destroyed by fire July 13, 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL. I also hold in my hand some seven memorials from the Legislature of the State of Oregon, but as copies have been presented this morning by the Vice-President I shall not now offer them.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of Frank Kitzmiller, of Doniphan County, Kansas, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WITHERS. I present the proceedings of a public meeting of citizens of Cumberland County, Virginia, without distinction of color, favoring a repeal of the tobacco tax. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WITHERS. I also present the petition of nearly one thousand citizens of Southside, Virginia, praying for the repeal or reduction of the tax on tobacco. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WITHERS. I will call the attention of the Committee on Finance to the fact that these petitions come from those who pay the tax on tobacco, the tax-payers. I see that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue states that no tax-payer has yet asked for a reduction of the tax. Virginia pays the second largest amount of tax on tobacco of any State of the Union, and these petitions are from citizens of Virginia who pay the tax and pray for its reduction.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of Thomas A. Howell and others, of Brooklyn, New York; the petition of J. B. Vaughan and others, of Clinton County, New York, and the petition of Levi Walton and others, of Clinton County, New York, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GORDON presented the memorial of Henry C. Wayne, of Georgia, in relation to a ship-canal through the Isthmus of Tehauntepec; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of John Harris, late private in Company B, Sixth Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, praying for the correction of his military record, and to be allowed back pay and bounty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 782) to authorize bondholders and other creditors of railroad corporations to elect receivers in suits in equity pending in the courts of the United States, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1651) to validate and confirm certain acknowledgments of deeds and other instruments of writing, under seal made in a foreign country, for lands lying in the District of Columbia, and the records thereof, reported it with amendments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. No. 778) for the relief of Samuel B. McLin, late associate justice of the Territory of New Mexico, to report the bill with the expression of opinion that it ought to pass.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. No. 805) supplemental to the several acts relative to the Union Pacific Railroad and its branches, and which provides for the eligibility of certain persons to the office of director, &c., to report that the committee ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Railroads, to which we think the subject appropriately belongs, as there is no matter of law involved in it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be entered. The Committee on the Judiciary will be discharged from the further consideration of the subject and the bill referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the petition of the Alaska Gold and Silver Mining Company, praying that such protection be afforded citizens of the United States as will enable them to prosecute business enterprises and that Alaska be attached to the district of Oregon for all judicial purposes, to report that in our opinion no present legislation of the character proposed by this petition is expedient, and we ask to be discharged from its further consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the same committee, to which were referred the bill (S. No. 810) to provide for short-hand reporters in the circuit and district courts of the United States, the bill (S. No. 1107) to authorize the appointment of stenographers to the United States circuit and district courts, and the bill (S. No. 1384) to authorize the appointment of stenographers in the United States circuit and district courts, to report adversely upon all these bills, the committee being of the opinion that in the present condition of business and of the country it is unnecessary to provide a specific code on this subject. I move that the bills be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Some time last session I introduced a bill (S. No. 828) to amend section 856 of the Revised Statutes so as to allow an appeal from the accounting officers of the Treasury to the Attorney-General in relation to the accounts of district attorneys, marshals, and other persons. That bill was referred at my instance to the Committee on the Judiciary, and they have agreed to report unanimously against it, including myself. I report it back and move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAMLIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1559) for the more efficient collection of the postal revenues; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. KELLOGG asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1562) for the relief of Jacob and Elizabeth Sener; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. INGALLS. I have been requested to introduce a bill for the relief of the Creek orphans under the treaty of March 24, 1832. The bill is accompanied by certain papers which I have not read; and, without committing myself to the provisions of the bill, I ask that it may be received and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1563) for the relief of the Creek orphans under the treaty of March 24, 1832; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1564) to extend the time to pre-emptors on the public lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1565) to authorize the sale of a portion of the Fort Dodge military reservation in the State of Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1566) authorizing the settlement of the claims of certain citizens of Kansas named therein; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1567) to create two additional land districts in the State of Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McDONALD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1568) to authorize the local taxation of the legal-tender Treasury notes of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. McDONALD. I desire to have the bill referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I wish to state in brief my reasons.

In introducing the bill I was at some loss to determine its proper reference. In some aspects of the question involved in it the Committee on Finance would seem to be the proper one to consider it, but as the main question, in my judgment, is one of constitutional power, I have thought best to ask its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

It was decided by the Supreme Court at an early day that the right to tax Government securities was not one of the reserved rights of the States, as it would be a tax upon the credit of the Federal Government and tend to embarrass it in the exercise of its granted right to borrow money. In the case of The Bank vs. The Supervisors, reported in 7 Wallace, 26, the direct question of the right of a State to tax the present issue of legal-tender notes was presented. In an opinion rendered by Chief-Justice Chase the right was denied, but the denial was placed upon the ground that the acts of Congress then in force expressly exempted from taxation by State authority "all United States bonds and other securities of the United States held by individuals," and that legal-tender notes were to be deemed securities of the United States. The law as carried into the Revised Statutes uses the words "or other obligations." It was urged that as these notes passed into general circulation and were used as money in private dealings, the necessity to preserve them from the power of local taxation did not exist as in the case of bonds or obligations that were used as mere instruments of credit. While admitting the force of the argument, the chief-justice in his opinion said that the question was one for Congress to decide and not for the courts.

Since then a material change has taken place in regard to these notes. By the act of May 31, 1878, they became a fixed part of the circulating medium of the country, as after that date the Secretary of the Treasury is forbidden to cancel or retire any more of them. And now that specie payments have been resumed and the holder of these notes has the right to have them converted into coin, by a Treasury order they are receivable for all Government dues, so that for all money purposes they are the equivalents of gold and silver coin. The volume, as shown by the last Treasury statement, now outstanding is $346,681,016. To permit this vast amount of property to remain untaxed would be grossly unjust if we have it in our power to prevent it, and I believe we have. The purpose of this bill is to bring the subject before the Senate for its full and mature consideration. When it comes up in a more regular form, I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to present my views more at length.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1569) authorizing the Secretary of War to establish a permanent military post at or near Baker City, in the State of Oregon, and making an appropriation therefor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1570) to aid in opening the Columbia River to free navigation; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1571) for the relief of William W. Ross; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduced a bill (S. No. 1572) for the relief of Frank Rinquet; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1573) for the relief of James Hunt; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1574) for the erection of a fire-proof building for the national museum; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (H. R. No. 3878) to provide for the change of name of the American built and owned schooner-yacht Zinga;

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill making an appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MITCHELL and Mr. SAUNDERS submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them to the bill (H. R. No. 5218) to establish post-roads herein named; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

COIN FOR DUTIES AND INTEREST.

Mr. BECK. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, being Executive Document No. 8, of the present session, in answer to the resolution of the Senate passed December 3, 1878, relative to the amount of silver coin received in payment of customs dues during the current fiscal year and the disposition which has been made of it, be referred to the Committee on Finance, and said committee is authorized and directed to make such investigations as it may deem necessary to ascertain whether the laws relative to the payment of customs dues, and the payment of interest on the public debt with the coin received therefrom, have been and are being complied with, and report by bill or otherwise.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to this resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think we had better see it in print, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will lie over under the rule.

Mr. BECK. I send to the desk the executive document referred to in the resolution, and I give notice that I shall call up the resolution to-morrow morning.

INVESTIGATION OF TREASURY ACCOUNTS.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the select committee to investigate the accounts, statements, and books of the Treasury Department be authorized to have printed at the Government Printing Office, from time to time, the testimony taken by the committee, and such statements and tables as the committee may order.

THIRTEENTH, FOURTEENTH, AND FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, this glad morning of the new year, when there are peace and joy and hope everywhere, I think is the best time possible to offer resolutions that I hold in my hand, which I trust will have a tendency, if they be unanimously adopted, as I hope they will after they are printed, to cement more perfectly the good-will and concord and unity of sentiment that are supposed to exist all over the country. I ask that the resolutions be read, printed, and laid on the table.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved as the judgment of the Senate, That the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States have been legally ratified, and are as valid and of the same paramount authority as any other part of the Constitution; that the people of each State have a common interest in the enforcement of the whole Constitution in every State in the Union, and that it is alike the right and duty of Congress to enforce said amendments and to protect every citizen in the exercise of all the rights thereby secured, by laws of the general character already passed for that purpose, and by further appropriate legislation so far as such enforcement and protection are not secured by existing laws; and that it is the duty of the executive department of the Government faithfully and with diligence to carry all such laws into impartial execution, and of Congress to appropriate all moneys needful to that end.

Resolved further, That it is the duty of Congress to provide by law for the full and impartial protection of all citizens of the United States legally qualified in the right to vote for Representatives in Congress, and to this end the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it hereby is, instructed to prepare and report as soon as may be a bill for the protection of such rights and the punishment of infractions thereof.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be printed, and lie on the table subject to the call of the Senator from Vermont.

ALASKA TERRITORY.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public service, the report of William Governeur Morris, special agent of the Treasury Department, recently submitted to that Department on the condition of the public service, resources, &c., of Alaska Territory.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. No. 2292) to constitute the city of Portsmouth, in the State of Ohio, a port of delivery; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3878) to provide for the change of name of the American built and owned schooner-yacht Zinga.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. No. 5333) for the removal of the political disabilities of John McIntosh Kell, of Georgia;

A bill (H. R. No. 5373) to remove the political disabilities of William H. Ward, of Norfolk, Virginia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5507) for the relief of Louisa M. Mansfield.

THE TRADE-DOLLAR.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, on the first day of the present session I had the honor to introduce a resolution in regard to the trade-dollar, which I ask may now be taken up for the purpose of submitting a few remarks upon it.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. VOORHEES, December 2, 1878:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of making the trade-dollar authorized by section 15 of the act of Congress approved February, 1873, a legal tender for all debts, public and private, and providing for its recoinage into the standard dollar of 412½ grains.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, among the many evils brought upon the industrial classes of this country by the bad financial legislation of the party in power the silver coin, known as the trade-dollar, is at this time peculiarly conspicuous and will long be remembered. Its functions as money are fraudulent, and the people have a right to protection from its further abuses. It has not a single element to recommend its retention as a part of our system of finance. It has no constitutional sanction whatever. The power of Congress to coin money gives it no support, for it is not money. It is simply an article of trade manufactured at the United States mints by an unconstitutional law of Congress. The Government has exactly the same power to engage in the manufacture of woolen fabrics or any other species of merchandise for trade that it has to set its mints running in the manufacture of silver bullion, not money, for barter and exchange as a commodity. Will any one undertake to dispute this proposition?

Its origin, however, is disreputable in other respects. It is a part of that conspiracy which demonetized the standard silver dollar of American history. The same act of Congress—the act of February 12, 1873—which deprived the American people of lawful silver money provided for the coinage of this well-executed counterfeit. The people were not consulted, nor indeed did they know of the existence of such a coin for years after it was authorized. The pretext for calling it into existence was that our own citizens did not need silver money, but that we needed silver coin with the appearance of money in our trade with China and other Asiatic countries. It is alleged in excuse by its authors that it was not intended to circulate in this country, and that therefore the legal-tender quality, which alone makes lawful money, was, by a sort of speculative fraud on outside barbarians, left out.

It has, however, failed in its mission abroad, and is now at home in large amounts, and still returning, to cheat and defraud the plain farmer out of his produce and the honest mechanic out of his labor. The inhabitants of the other side of the world quickly discovered that this coin had never received the essential quality of money at the hands of its own government, and hence they are shoving it back upon us with every returning ship from their shores to ours. The amount of trade-dollars in existence is much greater than the popular impression. Thirty-five millions have been coined and sent forth into the channels of trade and commerce, a large proportion of this amount being now in this country, and all of it tending rapidly in this direction. Can we afford to leave the people exposed to the dangers of such an amount of such currency? What a spectacle this Government now presents, putting into circulation a species of currency in the exact likeness and similitude of lawful money, and which yet is not lawful money, and every piece of which is the ready and easy instrument of fraud in the hands of corrupt and designing men!

In my recent association with the generous people of my own great State I met thousands of farmers, as well as other laboring people, who had suffered loss by reason of the deception practiced on them through the trade-dollar. As the time approached, soon after harvest, when farmers were anxious to realize on their wheat to meet pressing necessities, the trade-dollar in large sums appeared at different points in the State and was used in the purchase of grain at its face value. Very soon afterward the hard-working farmer discovered that he had received but ninety where he thought he had received a hundred cents; but ninety dollars where he had counted to himself a hundred. These incensed victims of a dishonest financial policy cannot stand here in person and demand redress of their Government which is engaged in cheating them; but, as one of their representatives on this floor, I shall faithfully perform that task in their place and stead. After full consideration, the best method for the cure of the trade-dollar blunder, as it appears to me, is to incorporate it into our lawful currency, making it a legal tender for all debts, public and private, and providing for its recoinage into the standard silver dollar as fast as it comes into the Treasury in the course of business.

It is objected to this that brokers, speculators, and financial gamblers now hold considerable sums of this illegitimate currency, and that a profit will accrue to them by making it lawful money. To some extent this is true, but such a minor evil as that ought not to be urged as a reason for continuing to rob and defraud our own citizens. No great wrong, like the huge imposture of thirty-five millions of trade-dollars, was ever corrected without some lawless gains to unscrupulous operators; but shall the wrong therefore remain to prey on innocent people—the laboring men and women of the whole country? If the brokers will profit by the necessary absorption of the trade-dollar into our legalized circulation, who is responsible for that disgraceful fact? Those, and those alone, who placed section 3513 in the act of February 12, 1873, thereby creating and throwing upon the people this coin without a fixed legal value, are responsible alike for the broker's speculations, and the laborer's losses. Not those who are seeking to remove a grievance, but those who brought it on, should bear the odium of all the consequences.

Another objection is made that there would be a lack of uniformity between the trade-dollar and our present standard dollar, the trade-dollar containing 420 grains of silver and the standard dollar containing 412½ grains. I can see no serious difficulty arising from this point. If the trade-dollar is made a legal tender it will simply be a somewhat better silver currency than that which we now have; and to this, it seems to me, there can be no rational objection on the part of those who profess so much devotion to what they term honest money. During the last session of Congress we heard an endless clamor for more silver in the dollar which we were seeking to restore to coinage and circulation. There were many labored efforts made here and elsewhere to show that the fathers in 1792 did not know how to make a good honest silver dollar. I was of a different opinion then and am now. I thought then, and still think, that the silver dollar of 412½ grains, devised by Jefferson as the unit of values, and put into coinage and circulation by the combined wisdom of Washington and Hamilton, is as acceptable to the American people and as useful in their affairs now as ever before in American history. But I am now appealing to those who entertained a different view, and I am commending to them thirty-five millions of dollars, in each one of which there are 7½ grains more of silver than there is in the dollar to which they were so bitterly opposed.

The want of uniformity, however, in our silver currency need only be temporary. A provision for the recoinage of the trade-dollar as fast as received at the Treasury into the standard dollar of 412½ grains would speedily bring about the desired result.

But the real and vital objection to making the trade-dollar a legal tender and to recoining it into the lawful money of the country comes from that class which is interested in diminishing rather than increasing the volume of our currency. The money monopolists care not so much about the kind of money which is circulated: it is the amount which principally concerns them. The proposition, therefore, to add thirty-five millions to our lawful currency alarms their avarice and excites their envenomed hostility. Such an increase would make money plentier, the rate of interest lower; it would augment the value of property and labor, afford some relief to struggling debtors, and stimulate the prostrate business of the country. All this, however, is adverse to the interests of capital which is withdrawn from the channels of trade and is watching for investments at usurious rates of interest or in property at bankrupt prices.

From the holders of this kind of capital the toiling millions of the world need expect nothing but oppression. Hungry avarice never sleeps, and its stony heart never relents. The laboring masses of every description, and also all the merchants and traders engaged in active business, demand an amount of currency in circulation, whether it be of gold, silver, or paper, which will measure the value of labor and property at fair and healthy rates, and not according to the standard of want and bankruptcy now prevailing. Money is the standard by which the value of every exchangeable commodity is measured. When the standard is shortened and contracted all values shrink in proportion, and the power of money over labor and the products of labor is correspondingly increased. A scarcity of money in circulation cheapens every acquisition of human toil, whether lands, or houses, or the growth of the fields. It has at the present time reduced the price of the western farmer's corn to from eighteen to twenty-five cents per bushel, hauled and delivered; and the price of his hogs to from two to two and a half cents per pound. On the other hand the scarcity of money multiplies tenfold the burden of every debt, tightens the ligatures of every mortgage, and hastens the harvest of bankruptcy for speculators in ruined estates to reap.

The opposition, therefore, to legalizing the trade-dollar, coming from the source it does, is not a matter of surprise. In fact, there is a deep-seated hostility to silver money of every kind coming from the same source and springing from the same motives. It is perfectly obvious that silver, as money, is not receiving fair play at the hands of the present Administration and those who draw their inspiration from it. It will not be forgotten how faithfully the Secretary of the Treasury obeyed the behests and served the cause of those adhering to the gold basis. When the bill remonetizing silver was approved by the Representatives of the people in both branches of Congress Mr. Sherman staked his judgment against the measure by inducing the President to interpose his veto. Under these circumstances he cannot complain if he is suspected of aiming to vindicate the wisdom of the veto rather than of striving in good faith to make the law a success.

It is unfortunate that the execution of this great and popular law is in the hands of its most conspicuous and pronounced enemy, one who embodies in his policy all the fears and hostilities of the money monopolists against what they are pleased to term a silver inflation. It happens, under a benign Providence, that the products of the silver mines of the United States are greater than all other countries in the world put together. It was the fear that the people would obtain too much currency from this source which inspired the furious opposition to silver money a year ago and which is now engaged in a conspiracy to practically demonetize it in defiance of law. Immediately upon the passage of the act restoring silver to coinage and circulation a systematic effort was commenced by which to prepare the public mind for its failure. The leading newspaper organs in the great money centers have from that day to this teemed in all their issues with dismal predictions, sneers, and abuse aimed at the lawful silver currency of the Government. The hard specie dollar of the fathers has been denounced as a dishonest dollar and scandalized and slandered in the same terms and by the same tongues and pens which have labored so long to load the greenback dollar with disgrace.

That the Secretary of the Treasury has lent the influence of his great office to this flagitious conspiracy is proven by his answer to the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] at the present session. He admits that he allowed the bondholder to dictate which kind of coin he would receive in payment of interest on his bonds, thus ignoring the right of the people to pay their coin obligations as well in silver as in gold. By this bad faith the Secretary has made himself a party to the unlawful scheme of driving silver away from the higher uses of money and of dishonoring it in the face of the world. It is in his option, not the creditors' option, whether he will pay our coin debts in gold or in silver, and as the servant and agent of the American people it is his plain duty to use both for that purpose in proportion to the amount of each which he has under his control.

Encouraged, however, by his policy and believing that public opinion was prepared for more open and aggressive hostilities, the associated national banks of New York, in the fore part of November last, proclaimed their rebellion against the constituted authorities of the Government and avowed their purpose to nullify its laws. In this lawless and insolent movement I believe the national banks of Boston concurred, and that the rebellion has spread no further than that point for the present. Sir, it is difficult to determine which is the more astounding in this action of the banks, their brazen audacity or their dense ignorance of the true temper of the American people on this subject. I have their proclamation at hand. It is addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury himself, and received by him without rebuke, if not with secret commendation. It is an elaborate argument against silver as money and an assertion of the right and duty of the banks to refuse to receive it as such. The following statements occur:

Upon the banks greatly depend the introduction of these coins into commercial use. * * * They are at liberty to accept or to decline these deficient coins when offered them upon deposit, to refuse them as money in their commercial exchanges with each other, and to withhold their influence in fastening them upon the community; and it is their most obvious interest and duty to do so.

Among the rules laid down for the government of the banks of New York City after January 1, 1879, are the following:

4. Decline silver dollars on deposit, as money, but only receive them under special contract to withdraw the same in kind.

5. Prohibit payment of balances on the clearing-house in silver certificates or in silver dollars, excepting as subsidiary coins in small sums, say, under $10.

6. Banks will hold the same attitude in respect to silver dollars that California banks have done respecting legal-tender notes; that is, accept them only when legally compelled, and decline further commercial relations with the compelling party.

These are the details of the proposed nullification. A law of Congress, enacted by a two-third majority of both branches, is found by the associated banks of the cities of New York and of Boston to be obnoxious to their interests and prejudices, and they proceed at once to abrogate and defy its execution. The nullifiers of South Carolina failed in a somewhat similar undertaking in 1832, and upon a question of financial policy; but the money power of New York and Boston appears to have learned nothing from their fate.

In the rebellious proclamation to which I am calling attention the existence of Congress is graciously recognized in the following terms:

It is confidently hoped that Congress, in view of the unexpected fluctuations of silver bullion since the law was passed, will reconsider and repeal it at an early day.

If, however, Congress should fail to be promptly overawed by the associated banks of New York, and their New England allies, and should refuse to register their haughty edict, they proceed to point out to the Secretary of the Treasury certain hostile measures for him to pursue against silver, in co-operation with their own conspiracy, by which they are entirely certain that within a year, at the most, the gold standard will be permanently restored, and the duty of Congress to again destroy silver money be made clear and unquestionable. But their overweening presumption does not stop at even this high pitch. Their scheme of nullification contemplates the control of the Legislature of New York, and the absolute demonetization of silver by that great State. I hold in my hand a bill already prepared and printed, which I am assured, on the highest authority, will be urged upon the approaching session of the New York Legislature by the associated banks. Its provisions are as follows:

An act to define what are gold contracts and to define the standard of gold in which they are payable, and to amend chapter 73 of the laws of 1875, entitled "An act to establish specie payment on all contracts or obligations payable in this State in dollars, and made after January 1, 1879."

The people of the State of New York, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. Sections 1 and 2 of chapter 73 of the laws of 1875, entitled "An act to establish specie payments on all contracts or obligations payable in this State in dollars, and made after January 1, 1879," are hereby amended so as to read as follows:

SECTION 1. All canal tolls imposed and all taxes levied and confirmed after the passage of this act shall be collected in United States gold coin and in United States notes so long as said United States notes are promptly redeemed in gold coin and no longer, and also shall be collected in national-bank notes which are redeemable in gold or which are redeemable in United States notes, provided the United States notes are promptly redeemed in United States gold coin; but tax-collectors and tax-receivers may receive in any one payment twenty-five cents or less of United States minor coins, or $5 or less in any one payment of United States subsidiary silver coins, at the market value of said minor and subsidiary silver coins in exchange for United States gold coin at the time the tax is paid.

SEC. 2. Every contract or obligation made or implied and payable in this State, and made or implied after this act shall take effect, and payable in dollars, but not made specifically payable in United States silver coin or in United States legal-tender notes, shall mean to be and shall be payable in United States gold coin, and, if not otherwise provided in the contract or obligation, shall be payable in United States gold coin of the standard of weight and fineness established by the laws of the United States at the time the contract or obligation shall have been made or implied, and such contract or obligation shall also be deemed to mean that the debtor may pay and that the creditor shall receive, in any one payment, twenty-five cents or less of United States minor coins, or $5 or less in any one payment of United States subsidiary silver coins, at the market value of said subsidiary silver and minor coins in exchange for United States gold coin at the time the payment is made.

If the Legislature of New York should join the associated banks in their conspiracy and rebellion, and should enact this bill into a law, it will present the question of a State attempting to nullify the authority of the Federal Government by interposing her own legislation on a subject of the deepest concern to the whole people. The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall have power to coin money, and to regulate the value thereof; and Congress has exercised that power by declaring that the silver dollar of 412½ grains shall be a part of the lawful money of the Government, and that its legal-tender value shall be the same as a dollar of gold. Section 10 of article 1 of the Constitution also declares that—

No State shall coin money, emit bills of credit, or make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts.

It is very plain, from these provisions, that neither the State of New York nor any other State has the power to prevent silver coin from circulating as money among its citizens on equal terms with gold.

But even the attempt to do so is full of danger to the rights of the people, proves the wide-spread and deep-seated conspiracy against silver currency, and is a bold threat of defiance to the Federal authority which will not be patiently borne by an already sensitive public opinion.

It is not my purpose, however, to detain the Senate at length on the present occasion. I desired to point out the evils of the trade-dollar currency and the propriety of making it lawful money; and in that connection also to disclose to the country the bad faith and the determined hostility which the standard legal-tender silver dollar is encountering at the hands of this Administration and its supporters. If silver money is quoted as inferior in value to gold or to greenbacks, it is because its enemies are powerful and active and have combined to dishonor it. If it has failed to reach the hands of the people as extensively as was expected, it must be remembered that its coinage and circulation depend very largely on the action of a Secretary of the Treasury who does not believe it ought to be coined or circulated at all.

In spite of all these adverse influences, however, I predict the ultimate triumph of the standard silver dollar. We are essentially a silver-producing country, and the intelligent American people will not consent to be deprived of the aid of this great agent of wealth in their struggles to regain commercial and business prosperity. We have just entered upon the cruel experiment of a forced resumption of specie payments. We have just passed the 1st of January, 1879, leaving behind us five years of such bankruptcy and business ruin as never before darkened the lives of the American people. An appalling penalty has been paid in order to be able to proclaim even the theory of specie resumption. Nothing has ever appeared to my mind a greater crime against the welfare and happiness of the people than the law enforcing a resumption of specie payments.

I think I may say without presumption that I have labored as hard for its repeal as any other Senator, but the protracted struggles of the last session and the repeated test votes on that subject have demonstrated beyond question that a majority of this body as at present constituted is inflexibly determined that the harsh and destructive experiment of coercive resumption shall be tried. The advocates of this policy feel a still further security, for the present at least, in the fact that the Executive stands ready with his veto against the repeal of the resumption act, and that a two-third majority of both Houses of Congress cannot be obtained to pass a bill for that purpose over his objections. I earnestly hope and fondly believe that at no distant day the will of the people will be more faithfully reflected both in this body and in the executive department of the Government.

Sir, in my judgment, the results to flow from the so-called specie resumption provided for in the act of January, 1875, will be full of disasters and hardships to the business and labor of the country. In making preparation for it too much evil has been done for any good to follow. Our coin interest-bearing debt has been largely increased from year to year, and our non-interest-bearing currency, the staunch and reliable greenback, so much needed in the hands of the people, has been contracted and destroyed.

The policy of resumption has been to increase the burdens of debt to the present and future generations, while depriving them of the means of saving themselves from general bankruptcy. More than $2,000,000,000 of private, individual debts based upon the highest considerations of value and of honor have been wiped out by the bankrupt sponge, and thus repudiated under the pressure of this destructive policy during the last five years. I submit that the stigma of repudiation ought to be affixed to those who have caused widespread and general repudiation rather than to those who have at all times insisted on the strict fulfillment of every contract and obligation entered into by the Government with its own citizens as well as with all others.

In the mean time, however, the people whom I have the honor in part to represent, in order to enable them to meet the evils which are at present inevitable with as little distress as possible, demand that resumption, whether a success or a failure, shall not rest on gold alone. They demand that all the resources of both the precious metals shall be brought to their assistance at this hard and trying period, and that if we are forced to have what is styled a specie basis, it shall be as broad, as comprehensive, and as strong as the unlimited coinage of silver, as well as of gold, can make it. They make these demands in order that the volume of currency, supposed to rest on this basis, may be a full and ample one, equal to the wants of an active business throughout the country.

Nor is this in any sense a mere party issue. The producing classes of all parties and those engaged in the pursuits of trade think substantially alike upon it. It is in their behalf, whatever their party ties, that I have plead heretofore and plead now for financial reform, justice, relief, and honesty; and in their behalf I shall continue to struggle for these great ends as long as I take part in public affairs. Our whole financial system is the work of the republican party, the result of nearly seventeen years of strictly partisan legislation, and to the leaders of that party, not to me, belongs its defense, if indeed any defense can ever be made for so much injustice and oppression inflicted on a long-suffering people.

REVISION OF THE PATENT LAWS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of its special order, being the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] which will be reported.

The SECRETARY. In the first section of the bill, after the words "before it," in the thirteenth line, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, however, That if in any suit instituted in any one circuit court of the United States the validity of a patent shall be determined upon final hearing, any other circuit court may recognize said decision, and in its discretion grant injunctions based thereon to continue pending an appeal to the Supreme Court in the first suit; and if the validity of any such patent has been decreed against in a suit instituted in any one circuit court, any other circuit court may in its discretion grant a stay of proceedings in any other suit brought under said patent, pending an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in said first suit.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, having completed what I had to say the other day upon the general system of our patent laws, I now proceed to consider some of the provisions of the pending bill. And I will say that so far as I have been able to examine the bill, I approve generally of its object and, with some exceptions, the object of its several provisions. It is possible some of them may be improved by amendment; but if so, such improvement will probably be suggested in the course of the discussion.

My purpose on the present occasion is to confine myself mainly to the provisions of the second section as amended by the committee.

The first proposition asserted in this section is that the measure of the plaintiff's recovery shall be the same both at law and in equity. I shall not stop at this moment to consider the question of power to make this provision applicable to pending suits and existing causes of action, as this section does; but shall postpone this question till we see just what the question is and what it really involves and just how the question of profits, or gains and profits, has grown up, and how the rule in reference thereto differs in an action at law from what it has finally become in a suit in equity.

Now, in the nature of things and as a logical principle stripped of all mere fictions, and as a question of right and justice or sound public policy, where a complainant has a right to bring his action in the same court in either of two forms, there never has been and there never can be any sound reason for allowing a greater amount of compensation or recovery in the one form of action than in the other, for precisely the same thing or grievance created by, or growing out of, precisely the same state of facts. That state of facts creating the injury complained of or the cause of action ought, upon all sound principle, in either or both forms of action, to entitle the claimant to just and adequate compensation, and no more. There may be good reason for bringing the action in one form rather than the other on account of the different process which may be issued or the mode of procedure adopted in the one form and not in the other, as in the case of an injunction which may be issued when the action is brought by bill in equity, and could not be issued in the same suit if the action were brought in the form of a suit at law, &c., though in the last case an injunction might be obtained by applying to a court of equity.

But the question of compensation, of the amount of recovery for the same injury, is and must be the same in both courts, while justice shall continue to be even one of the objects of a suit in either or both forms. And any rule which should make the amount of compensation for the same injury, arising from the same state of facts, different in the one court from what it is in the other, must, however technically logical it may seem, involve a lurking fallacy somewhere. That such a difference has grown up from the decisions of the Federal courts I will, before I get through, endeavor to show: and that it ought to be corrected and both forms of action put upon the same footing as to the amount of recovery for the same injury, I trust to the common sense and the sense of justice of every Senator. But before proceeding to this I will notice the next proposition proposed to be enacted by this section.

This second proposition is that, "if a license fee has already been established by a reasonable number of transactions applicable to the case, such license fee or a portion thereof according to the extent or duration of the infringement proved, shall be the measure of the plaintiff's recovery in all cases, except in cases where the defendant has made an actual profit from making for sale or selling the thing patented, or the product thereof." And in these excepted cases it provides that "the proportion of the actual profit of such making for sale or selling due to said infringement, shall be determined, and that proportion of such actual profit shall be the measure of the plaintiff's recovery; and in an action at law the court may appoint an auditor to ascertain the same, and his report shall be prima facie evidence; but if such proportion shall not be equal to the amount of a license fee established or to be determined in the manner hereinafter provided, (that is from all the evidence in the cause,) the plaintiff shall be entitled to recover such amount or so much thereof as shall be in excess of the profits so awarded."

Now, the first part of the provison above quoted, making the license fee the measure of damages, when such license fee has already been established by a "reasonable number of transactions applicable to the case," is a simple affirmance of the decisions of the Supreme Court in actions at law. (See Seymour vs. McCormick, 16 Howard, 480; Suffolk Company vs. Hayden, 3 Wallace, 315; Philip et al. vs. Nock, 17 Wallace, 460; Packet Company vs. Sickles, 19 Wallace, 611.) This last case declares:

> The rule of damages in an action at law for an infringement of the rights of the patentee has long been established in this court to be the customary price at which the patentee has licensed the use of his invention, where a sufficient number of sales or licenses have been made to establish a market value.

And this rule was applied not only as to mere users, but to manufacturers (Suffolk Company vs. Hayden, 3 Wallace, 315) and to vendors of patented articles, (Philip vs. Nock, 17 Wallace, 460.) And, in such cases at law, profits are not given nor do they constitute the measure of damages now, except in the single case where the patentee has found it for his interest to refuse to sell rights, or to receive a license fee, and has chosen to retain the entire monopoly himself. (See Seymour vs. McCormick, 16 Howard, 480.) But the court in cases at law, seeing that no one iron rule as to damages can be adopted in all cases, have very properly decided, that when the use has been limited, and for a short period only, this rule of giving the amount of a license fee is to be so restricted as not to do injustice, and the amount should be reduced below even the license fee, when it is evident the plaintiff has not suffered the amount of injury equivalent to a license fee. (See 93 U. S. R., p. 68 to 71.) There are cases at law where no license fee has been established, and where no certain measure of damages can be laid down, or any definite amount shown by the evidence, where general evidence may be resorted to for the purpose of showing the utility and advantage of the invention over old methods and devices: and for this purpose, and not as a measure of damages, evidence of profits may be given. (See Suffolk Company vs. Hayden, 3 Wallace, ub. sup.: also Burdette et al. vs. Denig et al., 2 Otto, 716.)

And this section permits the like evidence in such cases. And it was well said by the court in Seymour vs. McCormick, just cited, "there is no legal presumption binding on the jury, that third persons would have purchased of the patentee what they bought of the infringer, if the latter had not made and sold the thing patented." Now, Mr. President, I ask why should there be any better ground for the same or a similar presumption from the same state of facts in a court of equity? And yet, without this presumption or one not so well founded and, in most cases, far less likely to be true, it would be difficult to find any sound and just basis for the doctrine in equity which gives the profits the defendant has made, without any reference to the question whether the owner of the patent, but for the acts of the defendant, would have made the same profits, and equally without reference to the idea of mere compensation for the injury sustained by the complainant, which compensation (and neither more nor less) should be the amount of recovery equally in all cases and in all courts, except in the one class of cases, (not including one in five hundred,) where from the nature of the invention, it is for the interest of the inventor to retain the entire monopoly of the patent himself, and perhaps when the defendant may have acted maliciously or in bad faith.

It is quite clear, Mr. President, from the cases I have cited upon the question of allowing profits in a suit at law, that the exception I have quoted above from a part of the second section of the bill, and which allows profits to be recovered in an action at law, where the defendant has made for sale or sold "the thing patented or the product thereof," extends the right to recover profits in courts of law considerably beyond what is now recognized as the rule in those courts. In fact, I think it extends that power too far. I think no profits should be allowed, as such, in either court, except in cases where the infringement has been willful or in bad faith, or where the inventor has chosen to retain the entire monopoly of his invention.

This section then proceeds to provide that, in an action at law, the court may appoint an auditor to ascertain such profits, (in the excepted cases,) and that his report shall be prima facie evidence: thus giving to the court of law substantially the same facilities for ascertaining profits that they have in equity through a master, the want of which, in a court of law, has been assigned as the main reason for allowing profits in equity and not at law, and taking away all the substantial ground there ever was for the distinction in this respect, as to allowing profits, between a case in equity and one at law.

The section then further provides that, if the portion of the profits for the period of the infringement proved shall not be equal to the amount of a license fee established or to be determined from all the evidence in the case, as subsequently provided, the plaintiff shall be entitled to recover such amount, or so much thereof as shall be in excess of the profits so awarded. These provisions seem to me to be just and fair to both parties.

This section then proceeds to provide for that class of cases where a license fee has not been established by a reasonable number of transactions applicable to the case, and declares that a license fee for the use actually made shall be determined from all the evidence in the case: and that if the case shall not fall within the exception previously mentioned, (that is, where the defendant has made an actual profit from making for sale or selling the thing patented or the product thereof,) the license fee so determined shall be adopted as the measure of the plaintiff's recovery.

Now, as under this provision, the license fee to be determined is the amount to be recovered, it is but another name for the damages in an action at law. And being so, the rule here fixed for the damages is precisely the same as that now recognized in every action at law for all the cases included in the class here provided for, with the single exception of that class of cases where the patentee has found it for his interest, or from the nature of the patent it would manifestly be for his interest, to refuse to sell rights or grant licenses, and to use the invention himself and supply the market with the machine or product to be manufactured; as this is now the only class of cases at law in which profits are recognized as the measure of damages.

And I confess that, for this latter class of cases, I should prefer a provision which would allow profits in actions both at law and in equity, at least where the defendant has knowingly and willfully violated the patent by manufacture or sale. But if the committee do not see fit to offer or accept an amendment of this kind, I shall vote for the bill as it is. I am fully aware of the difficulty of framing any bill which shall meet all objections; and as I know the committee have fully and faithfully considered the whole subject, I shall vote for the provision as it is, which I believe affords a remedy for the greatest and most oppressive evils of the system as it now is; and I would therefore do nothing to obstruct the passage of the bill lest we should get no wholesome legislation upon the subject at this session. Amendments may be made hereafter as experience shall show to be necessary.

This section next provides that—

> Whenever the court shall be of opinion that the suit of the plaintiff or the defense of the defendant was vexatious and malicious, or the infringement was willful, the court may award against the defeated party such sum, by way of counsel fees and expenses of suit, as it shall deem just and reasonable.

This is intended to take the place of the provision in the existing law, allowing the court to treble the actual damages found by the jury, and I suppose of that provision in the act of 1870, (Revised Statutes, sec. 4921,) which, besides this power given in actions at law, enables the complainant in equity "to recover, in addition to the profits to be accounted for by the defendant, the damages the complainant has sustained thereby," which, understood according to the ordinary and natural meaning of the language, is a provision so shocking to common sense and the sense of justice of the court that the Supreme Court (Birdsall vs. Coolidge, 93 U. S. R., 70) has in effect held it not to be imperative, but to give a discretion to allow damages enough, in addition to profits, to make together a just compensation where the profits alone do not give a fair compensation, or perhaps an election to take the one or the other, but not both; a decision which (though this particular point was not involved) does equal credit to the high sense of justice of that court, and their ingenuity in the construction of the language of the statute, to effect so just a result.

Before proceeding to consider the rule in equity allowing profits, I will say that the whole subject of compensation for injury by infringement, relating as it does to a mere right and not to tangible property, is a very difficult one: and the questions arising in the course of administering the patent laws depend so much upon the particular circumstances of each case—circumstances almost infinite in their variety—that few if any universal rules can be laid down which will be just to both parties in all cases. In cases at law the courts have fully recognized the truth of this statement, and have at last so molded and qualified the various rules of damages as to get rid of all mere theories and technicalities and to work out justice and equity between the parties according to the circumstances of the particular case.

Thus, though they had laid down a general rule that, when a license fee had been established by a sufficient number of transactions to establish a market value of such license fee, that should constitute the measure of damages, yet in the case last cited, when the use by the defendant had been limited and of short duration, and the established license fee would therefore be manifestly more than the damages the plaintiff had sustained, the amount was required to be cut down so as not to exceed a just and fair compensation.

I see, therefore, nothing to complain of in the principle adopted in reference to compensation in cases at law. And if a like flexibility of the rules adopted in equity, a like freedom from technicalities, and a like determination so to mold, qualify, and limit such rules, so as to work out justice between the parties upon the great principle of just compensation, now prevailed in patent causes in equity, I should spare myself the task of discussing and the Senate that of listening to a discussion of the rule by which profits are allowed in patent causes in equity. That rule, as I understand it, assumes that in all cases of infringement, whether by manufacture and sale of the patented invention or its product, or by the mere use of the invention by one who has purchased a patented machine, all the gains and profits, above what the defendant would have made by the use of any machine or process open to the public to use, belong to the owner of the patent; that they are his profits.

Now, this assumption is true only in those cases where it is at least probable that the complainant would have made the same profits, if the defendant had not been guilty of the infringement; because there can be no sound reason founded upon any principle of justice, equity, or practical common sense, without reference to mere fictions which can entitle the complainant to recover more than a just compensation for the violation of his rights. There is therefore no real and substantial ground upon which it can be held that the complainant would, but for the infringement, have made the same profits the defendant has made, and therefore that they belong to the complainant, except in that class of cases where such profits now constitute a proper measure of damages in an action at law, and that is where the invention is such that it is from its nature for the interest of the patentee to retain the entire monopoly himself, and to supply the market with the machine, &c., invented, or the manufactured product thereof.

As, for instance, Mr. Edison might find it for his interest to retain the entire right to manufacture the telephone; Pullman to retain that of his sleeping cars. Or the inventor of a pin-machine which would make pins three times as fast, or for one-half the cost they can now be made, might supply the whole market, and it would be for his interest to retain the entire monopoly and refuse to grant licenses. In all such cases, at least, if the owner of the patent has elected so to retain the monopoly, there is a real, a sound and just ground to hold that the profits made by an infringer belong to the owner of the patent, because here is a strong probability that, but for the act of the defendant, the complainant would have made the same profits; or, at least, that he has been prevented from making them by the act of the defendant: and such profits would constitute a just compensation.

There is also in the case of other kinds of inventions, where it is clearly for the interest of the inventor that his invention should be used by others, some slight ground for holding a wrongful manufacturer of the invention or its product, who makes it for sale and sells it to others, liable to profits, as is done in the second section of this bill; though the ground for this is not so clearly right as in the first class of cases; and, as I have already intimated, I think the right to profits in this second class of cases should be limited to cases where the defendant has acted in bad faith.

But in all that numerous class of cases where the infringement is merely in the use of the patented machine by a person who has purchased it of a manufacturer in the ordinary course of business, and without actual notice—as the purchase of a mower for cutting hay—the assumption that the complainant would have made the same gains or profits, if the defendant had not, or that such profits therefore belong to the complainant, is not only without any foundation in fact, but palpably in defiance of all the facts, resting solely upon a fiction as contrary to the facts as it is unjust in its application.

In all this class of cases, and many others, the profits or gains made by the use of a patented machine bear no definite or necessary relation to the compensation which, upon any sound principle of justice or equity, the complainant ought to recover for the injury inflicted by the defendant. And yet, in all these cases, the assumption, or conclusive presumption, that all the profits belong to the complainant, though a bald, naked fiction, seems to be as firmly established by the courts as in those cases where the assumption rests upon facts or probabilities, and accords more or less with the just rights of the parties. And, while in courts of law they have got rid of all these mere fictions, and molded and modified their rules with reference to the facts of each case so as to secure the just rights of parties, yet in cases in equity, where it is generally supposed there is more flexibility of rules to meet the real justice of cases, this fiction seems, so far as I have been able to discover, to have become a fixed iron rule, applicable to all cases, incapable of modification by the facts of the case, and regardless of the question of just or fair compensation.

In this class of cases, therefore, it is just as fallacious to hold that the profits measure or tend to measure a just compensation for the injury to the complainant, as it would be to assert that a thermometer in which the mercury is forced up by artificial means correctly indicates the temperature, or that it regulates and controls the weather. In fact it does not seem to be now claimed that the allowance of profits rests upon the idea of compensation at all. (See Birdsall vs. Coolidge, 93 U. S. Rep., 70.)

The rules of damages in courts of law may be limited or qualified to cut down the amount of damages, so as not to exceed a just compensation. But this iron rule or fiction of equity gives all the profits—now all the gains and profits—at all events, and without the slightest reference to the real justice or equity of the case, and these profits cannot be cut down, as damages at law can be, for the sake of justice, as this would tend to discredit the fiction.

This fiction, this iron rule, resting upon the theory of an assumed trust, seems to me in most cases, like a foreign substance thrust into the living organism of our patent laws; irritating and distorting all the surrounding organs, and likely to continue to rankle until removed by legislation. I say this without the slightest disrespect to our courts, and with no intention to indulge in criticism; knowing how much easier it is to criticise than to avoid all cause of criticism; but knowing, at the same time, how seductive and plausible is this theory of trusts; how impossible it is for courts, as well as legislators, to foresee all the consequences to flow from a principle which, at first view, seems logically correct, but which will often prove to be unjust in its application. And I know, too, how very difficult it is for a court, having by its decisions, once adopted a principle which turns out to be unsound, to get rid of it without the aid of legislation.

Mr. President, I propose now to take a cursory view of the decisions of the courts upon this subject of profits, touching only the "vestigia," the leading decisions, from which it will, I think, sufficiently appear that I am justified in what I have said.

The first we hear of allowing profits is in some early cases at law at the circuit. In Lowell vs. Lewis, 1 Mason, 184, which was an action on the case for infringement by making and selling patented machines in 1817, Judge Story seems to have assumed that the proper rule of damages was the amount of profits actually received by the defendant in consequence of his using the plaintiff's invention. This was merely a circuit decision. And for some time after this we continue to hear in the circuit of profits as either strictly a measure of damages or as one of the most important elements in the estimation of damages.

I have not the time here to trace out all its course. But this doctrine of making profits the measure of damages in an action at law, seems never to have found a solid lodgment in the Supreme Court, and was completely repudiated in Seymour vs. McCormick, 16 How., 480, except in the single case where the patentee found it his interest to retain the entire monopoly of the patent himself. That court saw, what it is somewhat strange that any lawyer should have failed to see, that, in an action for damages to the plaintiff, the question is not what the defendant may have made by the tort, but the amount of injury suffered by the plaintiff; and that to reverse this was to reverse the theory and all the principles of any action for damages. The notion of allowing profits of the defendant for the plaintiff's damages must have been founded upon some vague notion of waiving a tort and suing for the proceeds, or upon the notion of a trust. This glimmering idea of a trust seems to have gradually and slowly developed itself, until it finally found a lodgment in the court.

I say here it was of slow growth, since, though the act of February, 1819, (volume 3, page 481,) gave to the circuit courts original jurisdiction in patent causes, as well in equity as at law, this idea of making a defendant a trustee for profits, and sustaining a bill upon that ground, does not seem to have become established in practice for many years after, and the action for infringement continued to be an action on the case at law for damages. And even after this theory of making the defendant a trustee for all the profits he had made had become firmly settled, it had very different proportions from those it has assumed since. Thus it was held in Livingston et al. vs. Woodworth et al., 15 Howard, 546, that in a suit in equity for an injunction and account of profits of a patented machine the defendant is accountable only for what profits he has actually made.

Precisely the same principle was reiterated in the decision in Dean vs. Mason, 20 Howard, 198, where the point was prominently made, as the master had allowed what the defendant might, by proper diligence, have made, and his report in this particular was overruled. (See also Rubber Company vs. Goodyear, 9 Wallace, 788, to same effect.) I need not notice all the cases in the progress of the court on its passage from the rule of profits actually made to the rule in its present shape, which goes far beyond actual profits and includes gains as profits, though the defendant lost in using the invention. But in Mowry vs. Whitney, 14 Wallace, 620, the court say that in accounting for profits "the question to be determined is, what advantage the infringer derived from the use of the invention over what he had in using other processes open to the public, and adequate to enable him to obtain an equally beneficial result."

(I confess that, to me, there is some obscurity in this; for if the other processes open to the public produce an equally beneficial result, I cannot discover what advantage or profit the defendant could derive from the use of the patent. But the court probably meant an equally beneficial result at a greater expense of material, as I judge from the case.) But the court proceeds to say, "the fruits of that advantage are his profits, and that advantage is the measure of his profits to be accounted for." Granting that profits ought to have been allowed at all in this case, the principle here laid down was correct enough as applied to the particular case. But unfortunately, as it seems to me, the court, assuming this to be a universal rule, applicable to all cases, has been carried far beyond its former decisions into allowing mere gains for profits, and that in cases where not even profits should have been allowed. I shall not stop to criticise this case.

But the case proceeds to announce a principle which is worthy of notice. The court say "the profits recoverable from an infringer are the measure of the patentee's damages, and though called profits, are really damages and unliquidated until a final decree is made," &c.

But, to show the progress of this theory of profits, from what are real profits, as at first established by the decisions, down to the present aspect of what are called profits, but are in fact losses or gains independent of all idea of profits, and in some cases acknowledged losses, I refer to the decision in the Cawood patent case, 4 Otto, 695, an equity case. The defendant had used the swedge blocks patented by plaintiff for repairing the crushed ends of their railroad rails.

In accounting, the defendants claimed that, notwithstanding the use of their blocks, it would have been cheaper for them to have cut off the ends of the rails than to have repaired them, and, therefore, that they had made no profits, but had lost by the operation. This argument is pronounced by the court plausible but not sound. "Assuming," say the court, "that experience has demonstrated what is claimed, the defendants undertook to repair the injured rails. They had the choice of repairing them on the common anvil or with the complainant's machine; but selecting the latter they saved a large part of what they must have expended in the use of the former, so that they had the advantage growing out of the invasion of complainant's patent." And they were held to account accordingly for all which it had cost them less than to repair upon the anvil. I am not now attacking the logic of the court, though it may be incidentally noticed that the reasoning assumes—and the conclusion seems to me to rest upon the assumption—that defendants would have repaired instead of cutting off the end of their rails though they had not thought of plaintiff's blocks, and that they would have done this upon the anvil at the greater cost, instead of cutting off the ends, which would have been cheaper, and this though they had not concluded to use the complainant's machine.

The last case which I shall notice upon this point is that of Nevs or Mevs vs. Conover, decided at October term, 1876, not reported in the regular series of Otto's reports, but to be found in the Official Gazette of the Patent Office, (January to June, 1877,) page 1111. This was a case in equity. The patented invention infringed by defendant was an improved machine for splitting kindling-wood, the principal feature of which was a device for the automatic feeding of the machine. The defendant used this in another machine called the Green machine. The evidence tended to show that with this device seventy-five cents per cord was saved over splitting it by hand. It was urged that the Green machine, in which defendant used plaintiff's invention, was old and defective, and that no profits were actually received from the use. But the court say "if the defendant was a loser by splitting wood with the Green machine, his loss was less to the extent of seventy-five cents on each cord than it would have been had he not used the patented invention;" and he was held accountable for this as profits, though he lost in splitting wood even with this invention and would have lost though he should have to pay nothing for its use.

I do not propose to stop here to criticise the rule of profits here laid down, though it is evident it is something else than profits which is here allowed. I only wish to suggest in passing, whether the conclusion of the court is not based upon the assumption, adopted as a conclusive presumption, that the defendant, had there been no such invention as that of the plaintiff's, would still have not only engaged in, but kept on, splitting wood by hand or by the Green machine alone until he had split the same amount as he did with its use, although he would have been losing seventy-five cents per cord more than he did lose with the aid of plaintiff's invention, and though he lost by splitting, even with the aid of that invention, without paying anything for its use.

Now, I must be allowed to doubt the validity of this assumption, as a presumption of law. It may be that those who engage in splitting kindling wood might do this; but if we are conclusively to assume it as a presumption of law, then the law ought to presume, at the same time, that wood-splitters are non compos and should be put under guardianship at once. It may be that the rule adopted may rest upon some other ground entirely sound in logic and in law. I suppose I ought to presume that it does. But when I see results from a course of legal reasoning which seem to me to operate harshly and unjustly in their application, I never can avoid the suspicion that there must be some fallacy either in the premises or the conclusion, or somewhere between the two. And the results in this case, I confess, do not seem to me to be exactly just. And it is quite manifest that what the complainant was allowed to recover in this case was not measured, or in the remotest degree affected by, any idea of just compensation for the injury he had suffered by the use of the machine. But this is equally true of all the cases where profits are allowed in equity for an infringement by mere use of a patented machine, except in the single class of cases where the patentee has chosen to retain the entire monopoly of his invention. And, in this connection, I will say that I heartily approve that provision in the second section of this bill prohibiting the recovery or account of mere savings, which are not profits, and confining the recovery to actual profits. I only wish the provision had been broader, prohibiting the allowance of profits in all cases except in the classes of cases I have already indicated, in which profits may be properly allowed.

I have said, Mr. President, that this rule of recovery of profits, in equity, for the same transaction, for the same identical injury for which damages would be recovered in a suit at law, and not profits except in very rare cases, is based upon the theory of a trust; that the infringer is treated as a trustee for all the profits he may have made by the infringement. I now proceed to consider this, and to show that the main ground of adopting the profits made by defendant as the measure of compensation and recovery in equity, instead of the damages the plaintiff is shown to have suffered, as in an action at law, not only rests upon the theory of a trust, but that this theory is adopted in equity, and not at law, mainly because in a case in equity the court, through a reference to a master and a report from him, has greater facilities in ascertaining and adjusting the profits than a court of law.

In Packet Company vs. Sickles, (19 Wallace, 611,) which was a case at law in which the right to profits was insisted upon, Mr. Justice Miller, giving the decision of the court denying that profits ought to be recovered in that case, proceeds to say:

> The rule in suits in equity of ascertaining by a reference to a master the profits which the defendant has made by the use of the plaintiff's invention, stands upon a different principle. It is that of converting the infringer into a trustee for the patentee, as regards the profits thus made; and the adjustment of these profits is subject to all the equitable considerations which are necessary to do complete justice between the parties, many of which would be inappropriate in a trial by jury. With these corrective powers in the hands of the chancellor, the rule of assuming profits as the ground-work for estimating the compensation due from the infringer to the patentee has produced results calculated to suggest distrust of its universal application even in courts of equity.

Mr. Justice Miller was well justified in this remark, and if he had said further that there have been very few cases where it has been applied in equity in which it has not worked injustice, I should have agreed with him in that also. If he had said also that the greater facility of ascertaining profits in equity is no sound reason for allowing them in cases where, as matter of principle and justice, they do not constitute a just measure of compensation when ascertained—a proposition which, judging from the cases, has hardly been fully appreciated—I should also have agreed in that.

But just here, Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of Senators to the fact that the real ground upon which the Supreme Court here base the rule of giving profits in equity and not at law, is the greater facility of ascertaining them by reference to, and the report of, a master; and the power the court have over the report in giving effect to the real equities of the parties. And in connection with this, to say that the present bill, in providing for the appointment of an auditor to take proof and report, has removed all substantial grounds for this distinction in those cases where profits may be allowed, and has thus carried out and removed all objection to, the principle that the measure of the plaintiff's recovery shall be the same both at law and in equity, as it always should have been.

In short, it is evident that all the difference upon this subject as to the mode of recovery, which sometimes might result in a difference of the amount of recovery, depended upon the different modes of procedure upon the same cause of action in the two different forms. It is also evident that this section—2 of the present bill—while it has narrowed somewhat the rule now existing in equity for the recovery of damages under the form and name of profits, by cutting off what are not profits in fact, has, at the same time, enlarged the right to recover damages under the name of profits in a court of law, and extended it to cases to which, by the present course of decisions, it did not extend. And since, by the decisions of the court, the amount recovered, under whatever name, is really or is intended to be the damages, and the mode and form of procedure adopted by this section affords an adequate remedy, we are now in a condition to consider the question of power arising upon that provision of this section which applies the section to causes of action now existing and to actions now pending in which no verdict or decree has been rendered, as well as to cases hereafter arising.

As a question of power merely, I do not see any difference between causes of action already accrued upon which no suit has yet been brought, and those already in suit; as a question of policy there may be. The question of power, then, in the present case is simply this: Has the Legislature, has Congress the power where under the present law (under which rights of action have accrued) an election of two different remedies is given for the same injury or upon the same cause of action for what, in its nature, is a tort, either of which remedies or forms of action is reasonably adequate for securing compensation—has Congress the power to change the form of the remedy or mode of proceeding in existence when the cause of action accrued? And that, too, when the recovery in either form is for the same identical thing under different names, and when it is but matter of accident which form would result in giving the greater amount in particular cases? This is the question of power and all there is of it.

There is no contract between the parties in the case, nor any question of impairing the obligation of a contract, as in the case of Bronson vs. Kinzie and the other cases following in that line. The right to sustain any action for this particular injury does not exist by the common law; the right to any remedy depends wholly upon the statute which the Legislature has seen fit to enact. Now, if there is anything settled in this country by judicial decisions, it is that no man has a vested right in any mere form of remedy or form of proceeding for enforcing even a vested cause of action. The principle upon this point is briefly but clearly stated by Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, fourth edition, pages 448, 449:

> As a general rule, every State has complete control over the remedies which it offers to suitors in its courts. It may abolish one class of courts and create another. It may give a new and additional remedy for a right or equity in existence. And it may abolish old remedies and substitute new, or even without substituting any, if a reasonable remedy still remains.

Such, I may add, is the result of the authorities upon this point, and these are as applicable to the legislative powers of Congress as to those of State Legislatures.

Let us test this question by a few familiar instances. Many, if not most, of the States still have the old common-law forms of actions; some of them more or less modified by statute; and in many cases the plaintiff would have an election to bring either trover or assumpsit, and by bringing trover he might prevent a set-off. Does any one doubt that, as to existing causes of action, the Legislature would have the right to abolish the action of trespass, and make trover applicable to all the cases now covered by both? or the power to do the very reverse? or even to abolish both trespass and trover, and to provide that assumpsit should be brought in all such cases, as well as in the cases to which it is now applicable? But I will go further. In all the States there is, I think, an action of replevin, or other equivalent proceeding in rem, for the recovery of the specific property of the plaintiff. Would it not be entirely competent to provide that, in an action of that kind, damages only should be recovered, as in trespass or trover, by which the plaintiff would recover only such damages as a jury, under the charge of the court, might give? I am inclined to think even such an act would be valid.

For myself, Mr. President, I am inclined to believe there is no want of power in Congress to make the provisions of this section applicable to causes of action accrued; and even those in suit where no verdict or decree has yet been rendered.

But I have not yet done with this theory of trusts, and the practice of allowing the recovery of profits, on that theory, in courts of equity. I propose now to give some further reasons why I think it wrong in principle, and unjust in its application to the mere users of patented articles, who have acted with that degree of prudence exercised by the average of our people, and in good faith. When it applies only to the willful and deliberate infringer, who makes and sells the patented article or its product for profit, in defiance of the patentee's rights, I shall not complain of its operation. In such a case the benefit of every doubt should be given to the patentee, and against the willful violator of his rights. And I am ready to admit that any man should, before entering upon the manufacture of the patented article for general sale and use, whether he has a patent or is manufacturing without one, be bound to make inquiry whether the article has been patented; and to take notice of the patentee's rights, as far as they may be ascertained at the Patent Office.

But, as to the great masses of the people who purchase a machine or article from a general manufacturer, without actual notice that the manufacturer is infringing a patent, and under circumstances not calculated to excite any suspicion of such a wrong—as in the case of a farmer purchasing a mowing or threshing machine, or a miller a water-wheel or a steam-engine, or a planter the compound of Paris green with flour or some other substance, and in each case only for his own use—as applied to all such and many other cases, the idea of making this accidental infringer a trustee and holding him accountable for all the gains and profits he may be shown by professional experts to have made by the use, however just it may seem to the judge on the bench, or however tempting from its facility of application, or however beautiful it may be in theory, is in practice and in its practical operation upon the people ruinously unjust.

The theory in the abstract and on paper may seem beautifully consistent and self-evident, as it doubtless would have been, if the average man, together with all his environments and all the circumstances of his daily life, had been got up on the same theory. But unfortunately, the great masses of mankind, with many of the circumstances existing around them, were got up upon quite a different plan, and with a sublime indifference to the theory: probably because the laws which control human affairs and conduct, and which are so infinitely various and infinitely modified in their actions, counteractions, and interactions, were established some time before the invention of the theory and without the aid of its guidance. This may be unfortunate for everything but the theory: for the result of those natural laws established so long before, has been that human conduct and human actions have never conformed to mathematical rules, straight lines, or true curves, nor the great mass of human affairs to any set formula or single model, but are as infinitely various as the circumstances under which they occur. And the consequence has been that the attempt to apply any single and inflexible theory to such masses of various and discordant circumstances, however attractive the theory may seem, results in a vast amount of injustice.

The theory may be all right in the abstract, but it is destructive in its operation. My idea may perhaps be illustrated by the anecdote of Sir Astley Cooper, the greatest of English surgeons, who had succeeded in performing, in a considerable number of cases, a surgical operation which, until his time had been deemed impossible without destroying life; and he had saved many of his patients. The surgeon of the French king, hearing of these, had also undertaken and performed several operations for the same purpose, but in a different way. Sir Astley, being in Paris for a few days, paid a friendly visit to this most eminent of French surgeons; and the conversation turning upon those particular operations, Sir Astley explained his mode of operation, which the Frenchman insisted did not conform to the rules of the science, and explaining his own mode, demonstrated that it was much more scientific. Sir Astley, without denying this, asked the Frenchman what proportion of his patients survived. "Oh," replied the Frenchman, "the patients all died; but the operation was beautifully scientific."

And so it is with this theory of trusteeship and of gains and profits when applied to any user of a patented machine or article who has acted in good faith and with the average prudence of men in his sphere of life. The theory may be very scientific, but the patients who are subjected to the operation nearly all die, financially at least.

And this must naturally be so for several reasons, some few only of which I shall have time to enumerate—reasons which, as affecting the actions of honest men of average prudence, the theory fails to take into account.

The theory as applied to all infringers alike, whether the manufacturer, the vendor, or the mere user of the thing patented, assumes that every man has notice or is bound to take notice of the existence of every patent issued from the Patent Office; and this is founded upon the fact that the issuing of the patent is a public act, of which all are bound to take notice.

A few practical instances occurring every day will show the gross injustice of holding all men equally bound to notice the existence of every patent, or rather making those who in fact have no such notice liable to the same amount of recovery, even of gains and profits, as those who in fact have such notice and purposely infringe the patent for the purpose of gain. The notice perhaps must be presumed far enough to hold all liable to some damage for an infringement; but in estimating the amount to be recovered, a difference should be recognized between those acting honestly and those acting dishonestly. This difference is quite generally recognized in courts of law in other than patent cases, and even in patent cases at law, (see Bryce vs. Dorr, 3 McLean, 582,) and even to some extent in a court of equity. Why it should not be carried far enough to relieve such parties acting in good faith from accounting for profits I do not see, or why compensation should not, in such cases, be enough.

A farmer, finding his grass or his wheat nearly ready to be cut, seeks to purchase a mower or reaper. He knows they are manufactured, and perhaps have been for some years, by certain parties, and generally sold. He has seen them in use. Agents have them for sale, in quantities, in the nearest town. He has every reason to believe that the manufacturer has the right to make and sell them, and has heard of no question of that right. Perhaps he sees upon the machine a stamp that it was patented at a certain time. He takes it for granted that all is right and makes the purchase. Practically he is compelled to take this for granted: for if he should stop to make a thorough inquiry into all the facts, as he knows nothing of the patent laws and has neither the knowledge nor the leisure necessary to make the investigation, if it is to be made at all, he must employ a patent lawyer or an expert to look into the case. The records of the Patent Office are to be examined, and often even then, when questions arise of interference with some other patent, it may take months in the Patent Office itself to settle the question; and often it could only be settled at the end of a lawsuit. And if all took this thorough course of inquiry before purchasing a machine the force in the Patent Office would have to be doubled to answer the inquiries.

If, therefore, the farmer must stop to make all these inquiries before he purchases, his crop would rot upon the ground, and perhaps two or three other crops before he can make the purchase. He must resort to the old method of the scythe or the sickle, and forego the use of the coveted machine; and as all other farmers must do the same a less number of the machines, under such a state of things, would be sold or used. Now practically it must be seen and felt that it is impossible, for the mass of farmers to make use of any greater vigilance or inquiry than in the case I have put. Not only the average farmer, but the great mass of the industrial classes, when they purchase any machine or implement for their own use act, and must act, in the same way. And while it may be necessary to hold each, in case of an infringement, to the payment of a reasonable license fee, it would be grossly and cruelly unjust to hold them liable for all the savings and profits which, by the testimony of experts, it might be shown that they have made.

No, Mr. President, the average degree of vigilance, that measure of diligence which the average of the industrial classes find practicable in the ordinary affairs of life, ought, at least, to shield them from any recovery in such cases beyond a reasonable license fee for the machines which they have honestly purchased for their own use. The case of the farmer is but a single instance; not, by any means, so strong as many others which might be put. The case of a miller in want of a water-wheel or steam-engine is still stronger, where the purchaser's main business depends upon the machinery, and where it often turns out that the wheel or engine, though it appears to be patented, and the purchaser supposes the maker to have a patent for the entire wheel, that the wheel or engine includes several other patents of different parts, some of less and perhaps some of more importance than that owned by the maker; and even his patent, whatever it is, may be found to be void, and an infringement upon some other and valid patent.

Take the case of a stave-machine. Some man perhaps, having a few hundred dollars capital, but mainly dependent upon his industry, has seen one and perhaps many of these machines, and thinks well of them; concludes to put all his means into the business of making staves; and perhaps, as most of our enterprising men do, incurs a considerable debt beyond his present means, relying upon the profits of the business and his own industry to carry him through. He purchases one of these machines, using the average degree of diligence I have already described, honestly believing that the manufacturer had the right to sell it to him. He goes into the business, is prosperous, makes considerable profits, extends the business, purchases more timber and perhaps timbered land in connection with it, builds houses and other buildings, and apportions his expenses and style of living to his apparent prosperity and rate of profits. He incurs debts in reliance upon a continuance of like profits for the future; and, as most enterprising business men do, he increases and extends the amount of his business by the large credits he obtains, and all this in reliance upon the continuation of such gains and profits, without a suspicion that all of these gains and profits belong to another.

But after some five, six, eight, or ten years, the holder of some patent, of which he has never before heard, and who has lain quiet while these gains and profits were being made without any effort of his, and who was therefore not interested to be in haste, now comes forward, shows his patent, and demands all the gains and profits he has thus made. Thus called upon, he inquires into the case, employs counsel, and at last finds the manufacturer of whom he purchased, if he pretended to have a patent or if any was supposed to exist, had one which he in good faith thought to be good; yet that it does not in fact cover the machine in question, while this patent newly brought to light does cover it. He must either settle with the new-comer upon his own terms, or he must litigate. But in either event all his gains, profits, and all he has made in the business beyond what he could have made without the machine, which constitutes all his property, perhaps, is at once swept away like chaff before the wind. He is left as poor as when he began, and worse. He finds himself in hopeless bankruptcy, and perhaps his creditors go down with him. And yet he has been all this time an honest, industrious, and useful citizen. He at least, Mr. President, would realize the cruelty of this injustice perpetrated under the name and guise of law, and, though by a court of equity, he would see and feel that it was but iniquity and oppression, pure and simple.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the policy of our law has tended so strongly in the direction of giving to patentees exceptional and dangerous powers that some serious abuses have arisen which should be corrected if we would do equal justice to all classes, and if we would preserve our patent system against a strong and growing purpose to repeal it. To understand the true meaning of our Constitution on the subject of patents we must examine the state of the law in this country at the time it was adopted. In this examination we find that to Congress is given the power to create a system of monopolies where none would otherwise exist by law. By the Constitution it is provided that when the system should be created it should be so framed as to promote the progress of science and useful arts, that such monopolies should only be created for a limited time, and that this should be done by securing to inventors the exclusive right to their respective discoveries. The power to give this security to inventors carries with it the right to judge of the nature of the security to be provided, so as to give to the inventor the full benefit and advantage of his right to his discovery, to the exclusion of all others who may attempt to share in or usurp the same right.

With reference to the welfare of the people, as it is connected with the progress of science and useful arts, it would be unwise and unjust to provide that no man shall under any circumstances use an inventor's discovery who has not his actual permission to do so. The variety of patents existing and to exist is so great (each one being granted because it promotes, moves forward, the progress of science and the useful arts) that a rule of law which would punish the use of a patented invention without a license from the patentee as a crime, or as being necessarily or by legal intendment a wrong to be redressed with penalties, would impede the public policy announced in this constitutional provision rather than carry it into effect. The opposite view of this subject is more rational, and is in accordance with the purpose of this wise constitutional provision, namely, that all patented inventions are designed for general use and the public advantage, and those only should be treated as trespassers and held liable to penalties or the imposition of heavy amercements, at the election of the patentee, who usurp the right of the patentee to his discovery; and those who use it in the way it was intended to be used, without making the thing patented for sale, or selling it, or any product thereof, should be required to make just compensation to the patentee for the value of such use of his discovery.

Our statute laws should be framed with reference to the proper distinction between those classes of infringements which usurp the right of the patentee and those that do not question his right or attempt to deprive him of it, but only use his discovery in the manner it was designed to be used, without any intention to speculate upon its use.

The right to a patent or copyright is entirely exceptional in our Constitution. No other such grant of an exclusive privilege is to be found in that instrument. It was put there rather for the public good than for the emolument of inventors, and in construing this right the rules should be liberal toward the public as to the use of the invention, while they should be strict in favor of the inventor with reference to the protection of his right to his discovery. The common law of England as modified by the statutes of the British Parliament was recognized as being in force in the colonies except so far as it conflicted with valid local statutes or with the new institutions of government that had their origin in our Revolution and consequent independence.

In England, during the reign of Queen Elizabeth, the monopolies in many branches of trade which had grown up under licenses from the Crown and by prescription had become so general and were so much complained of that the Parliament, in the twenty-first of James I, declared such monopolies to be contrary to law and void, except as to patents not exceeding fourteen years to the authors of new inventions, and except also patents concerning printing, saltpeter, gunpowder, great ordnance, and shot.

The English patent system was therefore a system of monopolies of ancient origin, and was protected by statute only to the extent of saving new inventions, when nearly all other monopolies were swept away. It was in an important sense a common-law right, but not such an one as survived the authority of the British Crown in this country. Monopolies were not in harmony with the equality of right which was a characteristic of our new republican form of government, and it was considered to be essential in order to create such a right to confer upon Congress the power to provide by law for the protection of the exclusive right to discoveries of a certain character, as had been done in Great Britain by letters-patent from the Crown.

The statute of James I was of no effect here, because we had no crowned head whose prerogative it was to grant such licenses, and there was nothing for the British statutes to protect. Our patent system, therefore, originated with the Constitution, and has its whole existence in that instrument and in the laws enacted in pursuance thereof.

Congress has the power to modify the system at any time for the purpose of better securing the inventor in the exclusive use of his discovery, and the country also against a burdensome and extortionate use of the license. And it is proper here to say that this right, however sacred it may be in its character as property, is still a right that has its origin in the license of the Government given according to law, and it never becomes so great a right as to be free from the incidents which attend all powers and privileges that depend for their origin and for their continuous support upon the license or permission of the Government.

The patentee does not become a party to a contract with the Government when a patent issues to him, yet he has as full right to protection as if he were a party to a contract; but the protection he can lawfully claim is such as consists with the nature of his discovery, the wants of society, and the public policy of the Government. If, for instance, his discovery furnishes a remedy for a pestilential disease, he could not claim the right to prohibit the sick from using it. If it provided a cheap and useful article of food in a time of dearth or famine, he could not stay the people from its enjoyment. If it provided the Government a means of destroying hostile fleets ravaging our coasts, he could not prevent the Government from using it. In these and many such cases that may be reasonably conjectured the Government, if it had been granting to the patentee an exclusive right by contract, would have made its separate contract with each inventor, and would have reserved such privileges as those to which I have adverted for the benefit of the people.

In the construction of all privileges and licenses granted by Congress, and especially with reference to exclusive privileges, it must be held that they are, in some sense, subordinate to the public good and public welfare and to the policy of the Government unless the nature of the grant otherwise clearly indicates, or the terms of the grant are otherwise clearly expressed.

In providing by law for carrying into effect this power of Congress to grant an exclusive privilege to a patentee—which power is not self-executing—Congress does not yield its control over the subject and leave the people bound in powerless subserviency to the caprice or cupidity of an inventor. The extent of the grant, so far as it affects the power of future legislation, is that good faith must be observed by the Government in securing to the inventor the exclusive right to his discovery, which includes all the benefits and advantages that justly flow from the discovery and its introduction into use; not such as might result from the concealment of it, or in the sole use of its advantages to himself or to a select few, unless such use was essential to its value, but from its use by all who may be benefited by it, freely and openly and at large, upon paying for it a just compensation. Could the unknown discoverer of nitrous ether, to whose fame the people of Boston have erected a monument almost as significant of a feeling of worship as that erected by the Greeks to the unknown god, have been permitted to confine the ministrations of that merciful agent to only a few of the many who would have died for the want of it during the life of a patent? He could never have gotten an injunction from a court of equity to prevent any sufferer from using his discovery. And yet if he, through whose intellect this blessing was received, could not have obtained such an injunction, when by the terms of the statute he is entitled to that writ to protect his exclusive right, on what ground would it have been denied him? Plainly because it would have been an obstruction to "the progress of science and the useful arts," instead of the promotion of them, to have allowed him to monopolize in this odious and inhumane way the entire advantages of his discovery.

The progress of science and the useful arts in their ameliorating and enriching effects among the people, in disseminating knowledge, in saving labor, in cheapening the necessities of life, in bringing every luxury and enjoyment worthy to be called such within reach of the great masses of mankind, is the great purpose intended to be secured by this constitutional provision, and the correlative exclusive right of the inventor to the discovery must be enjoyed by him, not in its secret and separate use, but in the way of just compensation to be paid him exclusively by all who may use his discovery.

An application for a patent accompanied with full specifications of the discovery or invention and a working model to teach others how to make the same thing or to apply the same principle is a dedication of that discovery or invention to public use and certainly to the benefit of mankind, subject to a condition that it shall remain his exclusive property for a limited time; and it has always seemed to me that it is a more reasonable interpretation of the Constitution thus to consider this provision than it is to place the exclusive right of the patentee upon the ground of giving him a right to the exclusive use of his discovery, with the power to prohibit its use by all other persons. But it is altogether indisputable that he must have just compensation for the use of his invention from those who use it and just and ample protection against those who would prevent him from the full and reasonable enjoyment of its benefits. I think a plain distinction exists between the exclusive right of an inventor to his discovery and the exclusive right to the use or enjoyment of his discovery after he has made it public. The right to the discovery includes the right of compensation for its use, which is implied in the word "exclusive," and it is not otherwise indicated in the text of the Constitution, but the right to the use of the discovery by the people when such compensation is given is clearly conferred in the express purpose and object of the provision "to promote the progress of science and useful arts."

To determine whether the words "exclusive right" in the text of the Constitution refer to the right of compensation for the use of the patent by the public, or to the exclusive use of it by the inventor so as to shut out the public, let us refer to some other parts of the Constitution. Those who argue for the latter proposition assume broadly that a patent granted by law under this section of the Constitution is property. This is certainly the strongest ground on which the exclusive nature of the right can be placed, since all property is protected by law as being in the separate and exclusive ownership of the person entitled to it. But, as property, it is subject to condemnation, and the owner is subject to be deprived of it for public use, if just compensation is made for it under the fifth amendment of the Constitution. In such cases the exclusive use of the owner is interrupted and supplemented by the necessary public use; but the right of property remains subject to that use, and survives the use, if it is not perpetual. In such cases, if Congress should deprive a patentee of the "exclusive" use of a remedy for yellow fever, and should make him just compensation for that use, would it be held that it had violated section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution? It seems to my mind very clear that such an act of Congress would be constitutional, because it would leave to the inventor the exclusive right to his discovery, which right would be realized in its only essential value—the exclusive right to compensation for its use.

If we treat a patent right as personal property, intangible, but distinct and actual, and give to it every quality that belongs to other personal property, yet it is not necessary to the full enjoyment of its value that the right to the exclusive use of it should remain with the patentee. On the contrary, it may be justly said that no man is an inventor within the meaning of the Constitution who invents solely for his own use. Such an inventor is not included in the provisions of the eighth section of article 1 of the Constitution, for he would not need its protection, and he would contribute nothing by his invention to the progress of science and useful arts. The value of all such inventions depends on the fact that the use is not exclusive, while the right to compensation for the use is exclusive. Scarcely a case has existed where the invention has not been patented with direct reference to its general public use. In all our statutes relating to patent rights, and in the results of the rulings of our Supreme Court, as I understand them, these propositions are sustained. There are opinions and dicta that seem to refute them, but in fact do not.

In granting injunctions against the use of a patented invention by an infringer or pirate, the courts do not act solely upon the idea that the unlicensed use of the thing patented is a sufficient ground for injunction, but they inquire whether the unauthorized use of it will inflict damage upon the patentee for which he can have no other adequate remedy. The decree of the court upon a bill for injunction has specific reference in almost every case to the question of the inability of the plaintiff otherwise to secure adequate compensation. The injunction is granted to prevent irreparable injury and not to gratify a capricious preference of the patentee that no one but himself should have the use or enjoyment of his discovery. No court would enjoin a man from saving his cotton crop by the use of a patented admixture of Paris green and flour because the patentee would say that he preferred to allow all the cotton in a region infested with cotton-worms to be destroyed except that growing in his own fields or in those of his customers, so that he might get a better price for it. The court would give him compensation if the patent held good, and would give him damages, and treble damages if he deserved it, as compensation, but would not stop the progress of science and useful arts in saving a cotton crop to the country to vindicate merely the right of a patentee to the exclusive enjoyment of the benefits of his discovery in a narrow and selfish way.

I have attempted, perhaps at the expense of too great a tax on the patience of the Senate, to present this view of the nature and quality of the inventor's exclusive right to his discovery, for the reason that I believe that much of the difficulty that has grown up in our statutory patent system and in the construction of its provisions has had its origin in a neglect of the distinctions I have been endeavoring to present and to establish.

I hold that just compensation to the patentee is the true legal and constitutional equivalent of any injury that an inventor can sustain at the hands of an infringer. Where the circumstances are such that the injury or danger of injury cannot be adequately compensated by the infringer, then the preventive powers of the court, to be exerted through writs of injunction, are the appropriate remedies; and when these are not necessary to be exerted, then the words "adequate compensation to the patentee" cover and include every right that the Constitution was intended to give him to protect his exclusive right to his discovery as against any infringer.

If the courts go further than this and impose punitive damages upon the infringer, it is done and should be done to repress wanton, vexatious, and illegal conduct on the part of the infringer, rather than as a measure of justice to the inventor.

Damages, penalties, profits, savings, costs, and every other classification of the measure of redress and of the rules of admeasurement that may be adopted to make out the redress to the patentee, whether at law or in equity, are all resolvable at last into this one idea which is fully expressed in the phrase I have just stated—adequate compensation to the patentee. I do not see how he can justly claim more than this, and I am sure that the law cannot give him more without adding to his monopoly a sort of sanctity in its quality of property or privilege that belongs to no other description of property. To go further is to place this right on a footing with the rights of character, of personal liberty and security, that are protected by rules of damages in the law which give compensation for injured reputation, suffering nature, wounded honor, and lacerated feelings. Patent rights are not rights that rank with these in dignity as they are estimated in the common law, and yet the statutes now seem to give to them the advantage. Every right of a patentee as against an infringer that is carried into a money judgment, whether at law or in equity, is a right to damages as compensation for a tort.

Our earliest enactments on this subject gave to the patentee an action on the case, in a court of law, to recover actual damages, and also exemplary damages not to exceed three times the amount of the actual damages found by the jury in favor of the plaintiff.

Up to 1840 the remedy in equity was limited to injunctions to prevent the violation of the rights of any inventor. The courts of equity, however, finding themselves in possession of this statutory jurisdiction, extended it, in virtue of their supposed inherent power to do full and complete justice between the parties, to all matters of account in cases where a trust was alleged by the complainant upon the idea of his right to waive the tort and to treat the infringer as a trustee. Afterward, in 1840, Congress in effect confirmed this jurisdiction and greatly enlarged it by enacting that—

> Upon a decree being rendered in any such case for an infringement the complainant shall be entitled to recover, in addition to the profits to be accounted for by the defendant, the damages the plaintiff has sustained thereby; and the court shall assess the same, or cause the same to be assessed under its direction. And the court shall have the same power to increase the damages, in its discretion, as is given to increase the damages found by verdict in actions in the nature of actions of trespass upon the case.

Thus in virtue of the enlargement by courts of equity of the jurisdiction given them by statute to grant injunctions in patent cases, so as to make it cover the whole field of their ordinary powers to administer trusts and to hold trustees to account; and in virtue of the statute to which I have just referred, the Federal courts of equity have encompassed the whole subject of remedial authority over infringers of patents. It is still true, however, that all the powers that courts of equity can exert in such cases are derived from the statutes, and it is within the power of Congress to change or modify their powers, and also their practice in reference to such cases. This graft, which was incorporated into the powers of the courts of equity by giving them permission to issue writs of injunction in patent causes, has not yet outgrown the powers of Congress to control the courts, though it promises soon to do this. The right of the plaintiff in an infringement suit, whether at law or in equity, although it has assumed the importance of a trust through the indulgence of the equity courts, is still only a right to recover damages as for a tort. It is still true that the right of the patentee to recover such damages is a right that springs from the acts of Congress; that it is not a contract right, and that it may be modified by the further legislation of Congress so that the use of an invention shall be made to promote the progress of science and the useful arts, and shall conform to a just public policy.

The introduction into our statutes of the right of a patentee to recover profits from an infringer and to recover damages in addition to profits is certainly a new departure in legal science, and obliterates all the rules and lines of demarkation that formerly separated the powers and jurisdiction of the law courts from those of the equity courts. From this effort to place the rights of patentees upon higher grounds than any other class of property-holders has been permitted to occupy, by giving them the contradictory right to claim damages and profits as the fruit of the same tort, confusion and litigation and serious injustice has resulted.

I give to the courts full credit for their efforts to disenthrall themselves from this difficult situation to which Congress has largely contributed, but I am satisfied that they will never be able to do it until we have so modified our statutes as to make the way somewhat smoother. The courts are required by the statutes to give a patentee the profits which shall accrue from an infringement, and also the damages sustained by the patentee in consequence of an infringement, and they have discretionary power to increase the damages threefold the amount of the injury that the patentee has sustained.

These three measures of damages, for they are nothing else, in their cumulative burden, in addition to costs, are imposed upon a person who commits a tort with reference to this species of property, and all this is simply the outgrowth of these statutes too favorably construed for the protection of patentees, and too strictly construed against the public. If the right to this patented monopoly had existed as a right of property merely at common law, we would search in vain through the precedents to find any such measures of compensation for any tort relating to it. But it is a monopoly granted by statute law, or rather by positive law in the United States, and those remarkable incidents are given to it only by statutes.

These strenuous provisions of the statutes doubtless had their origin in the effort to supply, through civil remedies, the absence of authority to punish criminally the infringements of patents. This has been a serious difficulty and it deserves to be carefully provided for, but I think there can be no doubt that Congress has gone too far in this direction. It has given the patentee in the increase of damages the remedy which belongs more properly to the people, as a measure of redress for an abuse of the law.

The patent laws were intended to be as beneficial to the country as to the patentee, and penalties, whether enforced through criminal or civil proceedings, should be imposed with reference to the general usefulness of this system and the public necessity for its protection. It is, however, in the fact that unintentional infringers are made subject to the heavy amercements of our present system that one dangerous evil is to be found. I need not enlarge upon this topic; it has been fully discussed in the course of this debate. One who infringes a patent without intending to do so should not be exposed to an account for profits or savings, or any punitive or exemplary damages that exceed the full measure of the right of the patentee to just compensation for the use of his discovery. Yet it rests in the mere discretion of the judge whether he will not decree against such innocent person profits and savings and damages, and then add to these threefold the actual damages and the costs, in order to get before the country a shining example of the power of the law to destroy one man for the better security of the rights which it has conferred upon another.

It is not surprising that such rules of law which have no recognition in the principles of natural justice, but are only prescribed by the arbitrary power of the statutes, should have encountered a stern and vigorous opposition.

If such laws are longer maintained they will seriously endanger the whole patent system of the country. In some cases, as in the railroad cases that are becoming so celebrated, and in the cases of the saving of cotton crops by the use of Paris green in combination with various glutinous substances, those who infringe the patents sometimes do it knowingly and openly, but without evil intent. They do it to save life and property, and in executing these purposes they should not be regarded as doing a moral wrong or as committing a malicious trespass upon the patentee. They are compelled, often, to use the patent to save themselves from great censure, and even from criminal responsibility. But the harsh statutory rule of profits, savings, damages, and threefold damages and costs is imposed upon them through the positive mandate of Congress, and the courts must obey, having no discretion except as to the exemplary damages.

In other cases patented inventions and processes are pirated and the patentee is wantonly deprived of the benefits of his invention. We have no criminal code to punish this great wrong, but in order to meet it we have provided our present system—a system intended to be applicable really to those classes of cases which are characterized by extreme wrong on the part of the infringers, but in practice it is sometimes applied to an extent that is cruel injustice to other classes of cases where there is no such evil purpose on the part of the infringer.

The second section of this bill is designed to take in all these cases and others that I have not named, and rising from the class where the infringer is innocent of any evil intent, through every intervening grade, to the highest degree of wrongful intention and unjust conduct on the part of the infringer, it endeavors to furnish a just rule by which the compensation of the patentee shall be admeasured according to his just deserts and the wrongful conduct of the infringer shall be punished according to its degree.

The committee may not have succeeded in this effort, even to their own entire satisfaction, but I feel assured that they have made essential progress in the right direction. The committee had the advantage of the ability and researches of the bar to an extent that is extraordinary. They have been assisted by many able and experienced counselors, representing every class of society interested in the administration of the patent laws, who appeared before them and entered into full discussion of every thought and every word in this entire bill. This bill has been under examination by conventions of men learned in the patent laws and by inventors of great reputation, and it has been so nearly agreed upon by them that it seems to have received, with more or less reluctance, the substantial concurrence of all these numerous and highly respectable persons.

I have sometimes thought that the language of the section could be improved so as to make it more clear and simple, or at least more in harmony with the methods of expression common to lawyers and judges in defining rights and providing remedies in analogous matters, but in this I have found I was perhaps mistaken. Patent law has its own terminology, settled by long practice, and it is much the safest to use such language in statutes as has a fixed legal signification. This section is thus carefully framed, and I doubt if any other words would more accurately express the precise modification the committee designed to make in the existing statutes. This section is framed upon the principle of awarding to the patentee just compensation for the use of his discovery, and it furnishes rules by which that compensation may be admeasured. Congress has always provided rules for this purpose, but the trouble has been that these rules were not framed with a proper regard to the rights of all concerned. Hitherto Congress has acted on the assumption that its chief duty was to protect the patentee, and that a patentee could do no wrong to individuals or to communities in the manner of his dealing with his monopoly.

The rules here presented have respect to all the rights of all persons interested in patented inventions. By these rules the patentee is held bound (1) to accept as an admission that is conclusive upon him the price he has set upon his discovery in his dealings, in a reasonable number of cases, as being a fair price for the use of the same. (2.) If no such price has been established by the dealings of the patentee, all the evidence in the case shall be considered by the court or jury in determining what is a fair price for the use actually made of the invention by the defendant. On the other hand, (3,) if the infringer has made an actual profit in making for sale or selling the thing patented or the product thereof, he is liable to account, either in a law court or in a court of equity, for the proportion of the actual profit for such making for sale, or selling, as is due to such infringement.

(4.) If such proportion of actual profits so made is not equal to the amount of a license fee established by the patentee or a just compensation for the use of his invention, to be determined from all the evidence in the case, he is entitled to at least the value of such license fee, or, in other words, to just compensation for the use of his invention by the infringer.

(5.) Accounts of savings are excluded, and the courts in ascertaining profits are confined to the inquiry as to actual profits resulting from making for sale or selling the thing patented or the product thereof.

(6.) Any evidence as to the advantage and utility of the invention is admissible as an element to aid in determining the value of a license fee where none has been established by the dealings of the patentee.

(7.) The court may protect either party against vexatious or malicious litigation or willful infringements by awarding against the other party such sum, by way of counsel fees and expenses of suit, as it shall deem just and reasonable. I will offer an amendment as a substitute for the amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole before this bill was reconsidered in committee, which, I think, will make that part included in lines 30 to 35 of the print before me more certain, and will remove what I consider a verbal inaccuracy. From this analysis of the second section of the bill, which adds nothing to its clearness, but is better suited to my own method of its interpretation as to its more important provisions, I understand that it gives to the patentee in all cases a fair compensation for the use of his invention by any person who uses the same for his own legitimate purposes or convenience. If it is used to make profits by the manufacture or the sale of the thing patented, or any product thereof, the patentee is entitled to an account of the actual profit so made.

In these two aspects this bill seems to cover the entire ground of legal and equitable right justly to be considered as being included in a license for a patented monopoly, and protects fully every element of property embraced in the exclusive right to a discovery. It permits the use of the patented invention by any person not using it for speculative purposes upon making to the owner just compensation for the use; and it gives to the patentee, at his option, all the profits made by an infringer who uses the discovery for speculative purposes. It also gives him a just measure of compensation for the expenses of any litigation he may incur against a willful infringer, whether he is only using the invention for his own purposes or is speculating upon it. It prevents the patentee from lying in wait to entrap infringers who are not willfully such, and to intimidate them with lawsuits into compliance with unjust exactions upon them. It prevents to a great extent the extraordinary and enormous expenses that have been rendered necessary in cases of accounting for savings and profits, and it saves defendants from much of that prying espionage into all the private history of their business which is so odious and so dangerous to commercial prosperity.

I am impressed with the belief that the provisions of the second section of the bill go as far as possible toward affording a just protection to the classes of unintentional infringers who are sought to be protected by the proposed amendments offered by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.] My sympathies are fully with him in his efforts to save innocent people from vexatious suits and from blackmailing on the part of those persons who seek to use the powers of our present harsh system for illicit gain. This bill puts a stop to vexatious litigation in patent causes, and in that way, as well as by confining a patentee to the compensation justly due him from one who does not speculate in the patent, but uses it for his own legitimate purposes, it seems to meet fully the evil provided against in the amendment of the honorable Senator.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] to the second section of the bill seems to leave everything to the discretion of the courts that pertains to the measure of the plaintiff's damages. I would not leave everything to the courts, even where they are presided over by such able and just men as the Senator from Illinois. And surely if we would deny absolute judicial power or discretion to him, we would not be justified in conferring it upon the entire body of the judiciary. Congress has not heretofore given such power to the courts, and it now seems to be necessary, to preserve our great and most useful patent system from overthrow, that we should enter upon definitions of the rights of patentees, and prescribe rules for their administration by which the judges must be bound. It was the courts, and not Congress, that invented the system of compensation for infringements of patents, upon the idea of administering trusts in courts of equity.

These courts have an ancient and well-earned reputation for enlarging their jurisdiction, and that disposition has caused them to supply by rules and orders certain features of patent law that Congress never saw fit to enact, such as an account of savings where there were no profits. Much of our present difficulty comes from this cause.

It is true that the courts are now trying to get back to safe ground, and I would aid them as far as possible by this bill. I would rate every compensation to a patentee for an infringement as damages due him as a recompense for a wrong, if I could frame a law according to my own views. This bill goes further, and gives him an account in certain cases, and this is the extreme limit to which I would go in that direction, because there is not, in fact, any relation of a fiduciary nature between a patentee and an infringer. It is forced upon him by the election of the patentee, and the laws should not permit him to be put in such relations except in those cases that are clearly defined in the statutes.

The statutes have not defined the sort of trustee an infringer is to make of himself by his tortious act. The courts sometimes treat him as a trustee ex maleficio, and at others as a trustee in invitum, or without an intent of evil-doing. In the first case they hold him liable as a trustee for all savings and for all profits made and for all profits he could have made with reasonable diligence and prudence and skill in the use of the patented invention. In the latter case they excuse him with an account of actual profits realized by him in the use of the invention.

Until the act of 1840 gave to the patentee a right to profits I do not believe there was any such right in any infringement suit. But that right now exists by statute, and to make that statute conform to justice and equity in its application to cases of infringement, I think it is wise that we should confine the profits to such as are mentioned in the second section of this bill. It seems to me that this is much safer than it is to allow this ill-defined statutory right to stand as provoking cause of interminable litigation. And I respectfully submit that any provision of law that guides the courts in administering this peculiar and very important right, and that gives to all concerned full information of the penalties incurred by an infringement of this right, is better than to leave the whole subject to be settled by a series of precedents that may not themselves be settled in a hundred years.

I now present my amendment to the Senate. I move to strike out lines 30 to 35, inclusive, of the second section, in the following words:

And whenever the court shall be of opinion that the suit of the plaintiff or the defense of the defendant was vexatious and malicious, or the infringement was willful, the court may award against the defeated party such sum, by way of counsel fees and expenses of suit, as it shall deem just and reasonable.

And insert as a substitute therefor the following:

And whenever the court shall be of opinion that the suit of the plaintiff or the defense of the defendant was vexatious or malicious, or the infringement was willful, the court may award against the party guilty of such vexatious or malicious conduct, or of such infringement, such sum by way of counsel fees and expenses of suit, as it shall deem just and reasonable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The amendment will be printed.

Mr. WADLEIGH obtained the floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. With the consent of the Senator from New Hampshire, I move that we go into executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at three o'clock and seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 7, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON.

The Journal of Friday, December 20, 1878, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 1244) for the relief of George Williams.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 1505) to repeal section 820 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to jurors in criminal cases; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

CHARGES AGAINST HON. J. H. ACKLEN.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ACKLEN] rises to a question of privilege.

Mr. ACKLEN. Mr. Speaker, I had trusted to have been spared the painful necessity of bringing before this House a matter that has been in almost every journal of the United States. I had trusted that it would have been buried like other slanders against every man who enters public life and to which he is so often and frequently subjected. Particularly did I hope that this would be the case when a committee composed of nine members of this House and one Senator had passed upon the charges against me and declared that they were maliciously made and without any foundation in fact. But, unfortunately, a late publication, which purports to be a synopsis of the testimony in that case upon which this committee acted, has been published, and I therefore feel compelled, not only in justice to myself but in justice to the gentlemen who composed this committee, to demand that these charges shall be subjected to the fullest investigation. They were infamously conceived and infamously made, and they were prepared with the devilish ingenuity that characterized the man who originated them.

Early in the month of October, when I had returned to the State of Louisiana, the charges were published. I demanded at that time that a committee composed of prominent politicians in the State of Louisiana should pass upon the case. They regarded it solely as a political question; and, viewing it only in that light, they rendered this decision which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, October 9, 1878.

After a careful consideration of the evidence, documentary and oral, which has been submitted to us, we are of the opinion that Mr. J. H. ACKLEN should withdraw from the canvass as a candidate for Congress in the third congressional district, and that no further action should be taken by us in the matter now under investigation.

Mr. ACKLEN. I declined to accept the decision of that committee in reference to a political question which I had not submitted to them, and I desired them by letter to pass upon the only question which affected me, and in which I was interested. I ask that the letter which I addressed to that committee, when the decision which the Clerk has just read had been handed to me, may now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, October 9, 1878.

Gentlemen of the committee:

Several days ago I addressed you a letter requesting a few days to collect additional evidence to show that I was not guilty of the charge of seduction, alleged in the affidavit made by Mrs. Wright. This time was granted me. I have desired from the beginning of this investigation that the committee decide the sole question at issue: whether I was guilty of the alleged seduction. If there are any members of this committee who have misunderstood me in this regard they are certainly at liberty to decline serving further, and as earnest of my good faith I shall beg the other members to supply their places by such parties as they choose. I do not wish a question of such paramount social moment to me to be in any wise hampered by politics. I beg at the hands of any member of the committee who is unwilling to pass upon the question of my being guilty or not guilty a written reply.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

J. H. ACKLEN.

Mr. ACKLEN. Thus it will be seen, Mr. Speaker, that I in fact appealed to the gentlemen of this committee to pass upon the social question, but they refused to do so, and declined to act any further in the matter. I felt under those circumstances that I was at liberty to present that same question to another committee in Louisiana, a committee composed of prominent politicians who were politically opposed to me. They subjected the evidence to the most careful scrutiny and rendered the decision which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, October 10, 1878.

We have carefully examined the documents and affidavits submitted to us by Mr. ACKLEN in the alleged seduction case, and it is our conclusion that he is innocent of the charge; and we are also convinced that the party who lately stirred up this matter did it for blackmailing purposes.

MICHAEL HAHN.
GEO. L. SMITH.
HENRY C. DIBBLE.
A. J. SYPHER.

We concur in the above except that part charging blackmailing, as we are of the opinion that H. L. Smith's motives were revenge.

MORRIS MARKS.
JACK WHARTON.

Mr. ACKLEN. I continued my canvass; my constituents sustained me, and I was re-elected by a majority tenfold that of 1876. Before leaving the State of Louisiana for Washington, fearing that a misapprehension of the nature of the decision of the Louisiana democratic committee might have gone abroad, I addressed to several members of that committee the letter which I now send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, November 9, 1878.

DEAR SIRS: As a misapprehension of the nature of the decision of the committee in the case lately examined, and of which you were members, has gone abroad, I desire to know whether or not you deemed the committee's letter to me a decision of the social question or if that letter did not solely refer to my political candidacy which the committee deemed endangered by the scandal.

Your obedient servant,

J. H. ACKLEN.

To Messrs. H. J. HEARSEY, J. R. ALCÉE GAUTHREAUX, and PAUL E. THÉARD, of the committee.

Mr. ACKLEN. Here is their reply.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, November 20, 1878.

DEAR SIR: Your note of recent date requesting an understanding of the letter addressed you by the committee selected relative to charges contained in an article in the New York Times of September 29 is received.

Without discussing the extent to which the committee deemed themselves authorized by you to go, it was held by them that should they deem it advisable for you in the interest of the party and the election of a member of Congress from your district to withdraw, they would declare that opinion, and it was understood that you should abide by it.

The committee were convinced that if the republicans made a canvass in your district, the affidavit against you or other documents would be printed and used in an attempt to destroy your chances of election and ruin your character. Hence, as your friends, and as democrats, in the interest of yourself and of the party, they advised you to withdraw from the canvass as a candidate for Congress. They, as a committee, ignored what you term the social question entirely, and were guided solely by what they considered to be the interests of the democracy of the State. They examined the question from a political stand-point only and from no other.

Subsequently you called the committee together, and raised the point that they had transcended their authority. You declared that you had never authorized them to consider the political phase of the question, but had limited them strictly to the question of your innocence or guilt. The difference of opinion between yourself on this issue and the committee was so great that it could not be reconciled and the committee declined to act further in the matter.

Very respectfully,

J. R. ALCÉE GAUTHREAUX.
H. J. HEARSEY.
PAUL E. THÉARD.

Hon. J. H. ACKLEN.

Mr. ACKLEN. Thus it will be seen, Mr. Speaker, to use the exact language of that committee, that they had "ignored the social question," and had regarded the matter only as a political question; and they had requested me to withdraw from the canvass solely in the interest of the democracy of the State of Louisiana. Such being the case, I was advised by my friends upon my arrival in Washington to submit the social question to a committee composed of the most eminent members of this House. That committee examined the social question thoroughly and fully, and they rendered the following decision.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 12, 1878.

To the public:

Some time ago serious charges were made against the social character of Hon. J. H. ACKLEN by an affidavit in the possession of H. L. Smith, and a committee of prominent democrats of Louisiana, after viewing the same from a political standpoint, deemed that ACKLEN'S re-election might be jeopardized by the publicity given the slander, and, as but a short time intervened between the publication and the election, advised him, on party grounds, to withdraw from the canvass. We quote the following from a letter addressed to Mr. ACKLEN by several members of that committee:

"It was held by them (the committee) that should they deem it advisable for you, in the interest of the party and the election of a member of Congress from your district, to withdraw, they would declare that opinion. The committee were convinced that if the republicans made a canvass in your district the affidavit against you would be printed and used in an attempt to destroy your chance of election. They, as a committee, ignored what you term the social question entirely, and were guided solely by what they considered to be the interests of the democracy of the State. They examined the question from a political stand-point only, and from no other."

Mr. ACKLEN declined to withdraw from the canvass, but was advised to submit the charges to a republican committee, in order to stop the use of the slander against him by his political opponents. This he did, and this committee pronounced him innocent of the charges, and the attempt one of blackmail. He was re-elected by a majority tenfold that of 1876.

We have felt it our duty toward Mr. ACKLEN and the State of Louisiana to carefully examine into these charges, strictly from a social stand-point, and have done so. After an examination of the whole case, of letters and documents from the most reputable people of the parish where the alleged wrong is said to have occurred, and other papers bearing on the case, which leaves no doubt whatever in our minds, we pronounce most emphatically that the charge against Mr. ACKLEN is entirely without foundation and a base attack upon his character.

J. B. EUSTIS, United States Senator, Louisiana.
J. B. ELAM, M. C., Louisiana.
E. W. ROBERTSON, M. C., Louisiana.
E. JOHN ELLIS, M. C., Louisiana.

By request we have carefully examined and considered the evidence submitted to us touching the charge of seduction against Mr. ACKLEN, and referred to in the above statement. The conclusion is inevitable that this charge was maliciously made and had no foundation in fact.

CHARLES FOSTER, M. C., Ohio.
W. P. FRYE, M. C., Maine.
W. H. CALKINS, M. C., Indiana.
THOMAS R. COBB, M. C., Indiana.
H. D. MONEY, M. C., Mississippi.
JESSE J. YEATES, M. C., North Carolina.

Mr. ACKLEN. Now, Mr. Speaker, on my return to the State of Louisiana I was confronted in the public press by what purported to have been a synopsis of the testimony of this case, and the question was raised as to whether the New Orleans committee had made a righteous decision or whether the Washington committee had not been misinformed. It was even insinuated that some of the documents which had been submitted to the Washington committee were forgeries. I waited one day, and submitted through the press to the New Orleans committee the following card which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the public and my constituents and the New Orleans democratic committee:

The New Orleans committee which in October requested me to retire from the canvass as a candidate for Congress on party grounds did so, as they state, after an examination of charges against me from a political stand-point only. I declined to retire and my constituents sustained me; I was re-elected by a majority tenfold that of 1876.

As this committee did not pass upon the only question about which I care, and which affects me socially, namely, the charge of seduction, I felt quite at liberty to submit that social question to a committee in Washington, whose finding in the case I print below. This latter committee had before them a mass of evidence which the New Orleans committee never saw. I could readily print this to sustain their decision and entirely disprove the charge of seduction, but it is of such a character that a just sense of modesty induces me to withhold it from the public prints.

As the New Orleans committee did not pass upon the social question and the Washington committee did, and declared me innocent of the charge, now if they or any of them hold that the finding of the Washington committee was incorrect in fact then I demand that the New Orleans committee shall also examine the social question—the charge of seduction, have summoned all the witnesses they or I desire, apply all the forms of a judicial inquiry to the case, and render their decision as to whether I am guilty or innocent of this charge of seduction. They formerly ignored the social question entirely, and as it is now revived I am prepared to prove my innocence socially as I did my strength politically.

Governor Penn evidently misconstrued my motive in submitting the case to the Washington committee, which was a social and not a political one, or he would not have done me the injustice of publishing such statement as he had in his hands without first giving me the opportunity of furnishing further testimony on the social question. This has a tendency to affect me socially, and hereafter I desire the committee to publish testimony in full and let the branding-iron rest where it properly belongs.

If any responsible person will make the charge I am willing and ready to meet it legally, socially, or personally.

As my time is limited, I hope this committee will meet at an early date in order to allow me to furnish the evidence which will exonerate me with them, as it did with the Washington committee.

J. H. ACKLEN.

NEW ORLEANS, December 26, 1878.

Mr. ACKLEN. Thus it will be seen that I exhausted every means within my power to secure a decision of the social question by the New Orleans committee. That committee first passed upon it politically, and the answer given to me by that committee was that they declined to touch the social question further. Under these circumstances I have felt compelled to let the bright sunlight of truth shine upon the case by an investigation by this House, and let the people of the country see where the branding-iron properly belongs.

I ask the adoption of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas J. H. ACKLEN, a member of this House, has been charged by affidavit with having seduced Mattie Palfrey Wright, now deceased, in April, 1877, said affidavit having been drawn up by one H. L. Smith, also deceased, and sworn to by said Mattie Wright: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Speaker of this House be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a committee of three members of this House, whose duty it shall be to investigate the truth or falsity of said charge, and report back to this House at as early a date as possible. Said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, employ one stenographer and deputy sergeant-at-arms, and if necessary visit by subcommittee such place as the nature of the case demands.

Mr. ACKLEN. I ask that the resolution be put upon its passage, and I trust that no objection will be raised to it. This question involves my honor, which is as dear to me as the honor of any member in this Hall.

Mr. REAGAN. With every respect to the member from Louisiana and with no disposition to withhold from him anything that he has a right to claim, I must object to this resolution. This is not a question of which this House can take cognizance. It is not anything involving the privilege of a member, and it would be an unusual and a very awkward thing to enter into such an investigation.

Mr. ACKLEN. If the gentleman from Texas will allow me a moment, I will say that this charge is not alone the charge which has been read here, but a charge of crime is made against me. I am charged with a crime, and it affects me not only socially but politically. If that charge be true, if I have been guilty of this crime, I have no right to sit here. I claim my right as a member of Congress to have the matter investigated to the very utmost, and then it will be seen that my record in this case is as pure as snow. I differ with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] when he says that the House cannot take cognizance in this case. I am charged with a crime. The statutes of Louisiana make that with which I am charged a crime, and I trust that the gentleman from Texas will not urge his objection, and that the House will sustain me in this investigation, because it is a matter dear to my heart; dear to me as respects my family relations; dear to every man of probity and honor. I therefore sincerely trust that the gentleman from Texas will withdraw his objection.

Mr. REAGAN. I felt, sir, when I rose, the delicacy of interposing an objection in this case, and I should have wished that some one else had done it rather than myself. I dislike to oppose the request of the gentleman from Louisiana, but certainly the charge as I understand it is one over which this House has no earthly control. Sir, it does not come within our jurisdiction. I would do all I could to vindicate the character of an associate upon this floor, but we have no jurisdiction of this matter.

It seems to me that we should place ourselves in an unfortunate position, to say the least of it, before the country if we assume to take jurisdiction of a question which requires us to investigate matters over which we have no jurisdiction.

A charge of crime may be made against any and every member of this House, but until a conviction is had upon the charge such member is not disqualified, and this House is not justified in assuming jurisdiction over the matter. A charge of crime gives this House no jurisdiction; a charge affecting the social standing of a member gives this House no jurisdiction.

I would do everything that would place the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ACKLEN] in his proper position, but I think we would be assuming a jurisdiction that does not belong to us should this resolution be adopted. I have thus discharged an unpleasant duty, and will leave the matter for the action of the House.

Mr. ACKLEN. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] will allow me, he certainly will not deny the fact that this House is the judge not only of the election but of the qualifications of its members; and if this charge is true against me I am not qualified to sit upon this floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ACKLEN] rose to a question of personal privilege. The Chair has been reluctant to interrupt him, and is reluctant now to decide in a matter affecting the character of a member of this House. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] raises the objection that this does not embrace a question of personal privilege.

Since this discussion has been going on, the Chair, so far as his memory enables him to recollect, fails to remember a single instance during his own term of service in this House wherein charges of this character, which do not directly affect the representative character of a member of this House, have been made subjects of inquiry by the House. The Chair finds in one instance a decision made by one of his predecessors, Mr. Speaker Linn Boyd, which he desires to have read to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Thomas H. Bayly submitted, as a question of privilege, the following resolution, namely:

Resolved, That the special committee of which Hon. Mr. Letcher is chairman be instructed to communicate to this House any communication made to that committee reflecting upon the representative character of T. H. Bayly, a member of this House, by B. E. Green or others, with a view that the House may take such action as to it may seem proper, the said committee having decided that it was not within their jurisdiction.

The SPEAKER. The decision in that case by Mr. Speaker Boyd was that it was not a subject of investigation unless it did actually affect the official character of the Representative. In a case like this the Chair is quite willing to submit the question to the House with this preliminary statement on his part.

Mr. ACKLEN. I want this House to know, and I want the country at large to know, that the courts have been closed against me in this case by the death of all the parties connected with this slander. I have no opportunity to vindicate myself outside of this House and outside of an investigation ordered by this House. I have made this demand, and I appeal to the House to sustain it. I have been as innocent of this individual charge as any man in this House, and I want this House to know it. I appeal again to members of this House to sustain me by adopting the resolution which I have submitted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question to the House and the House can determine it. It is a question of very great importance to settle the principle and ought to have passed upon it the judgment of the House rather than the judgment of a single individual who may happen for the time being to occupy the Speaker's chair. As many, therefore, as are of opinion that this embraces a question of personal privilege will say "ay."

Mr. GARFIELD. I was in hopes the Chair would have put the question in a little different form. If by "personal privilege" is meant the ordinary rights which the House grants to a man to make a personal explanation, I certainly should vote "ay."

The SPEAKER. That has already been accorded to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. GARFIELD. And therefore I want it understood that my vote, which in this case will be "no," means that I do not conceive that this is a case about which the House has any jurisdiction to investigate, and in that sense I vote against it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say in answer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that the distinction he has drawn is a very proper one. The Chair himself has allowed the personal explanation to be made. The question whether it embraces a privilege affecting the character of a member of the House the Chair prefers to submit to the House.

The question having been submitted, the Speaker decided that the "noes" had it, and that the resolution was not before the House.

CHARGES AGAINST JUDGE BLODGETT.

Mr. HARRISON. I rise to a question of privilege. I hold in my hand a petition signed by respectable lawyers of the city of Chicago.

Mr. PAGE. Is it in order to call for the regular order at this time?

The SPEAKER. This is the regular order. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] rises, as he states, to a question of privilege.

Mr. HARRISON. I hold in my hand a petition signed by respectable lawyers of the city of Chicago charging upon a high official in the State of Illinois, the district judge of the northern district of that State, gross misconduct and corruption as an officer. I have also here a petition signed on last Friday and Saturday by eighteen hundred citizens of Chicago, asking that a special committee be appointed to investigate this matter. I have also a dispatch received last night from one of the first citizens of Chicago, stating that on yesterday thirty-eight hundred more signatures were attached to the same petition, making nearly six thousand in all. With this explanation I present the resolution which I send to the Clerk, and ask for its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is charged that Henry W. Blodgett, district judge of the northern district of Illinois, has been guilty of gross misconduct and corruption in his official conduct as such judge: Therefore,

Resolved, That a special committee of five members of this House be appointed to examine such charges and to inquire into the official conduct of said judge, Henry W. Blodgett, and to report what action, if any, this House should take in the premises; that said committee shall have the power to send for persons and papers, appoint a clerk and stenographer and such other employés as it may deem necessary, and, in its discretion, to visit and sit in the city of Chicago for the purpose of examining witnesses and court records; and that it have power to report at any time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that this resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask that the petition accompanying the resolution be read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object to the adoption of the resolution. Let it be referred to the Judiciary Committee, and let them report it if they think proper.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois rises in his place and, as a question of privilege, submits the resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, I raise the question as to its being a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. That the gentleman has the entire right to do.

Mr. GARFIELD. The provision giving the right to report at any time, as well as several other points of the resolution, cannot be adopted except by unanimous consent or under a suspension of the rules. I know nothing about this matter. I only say that so grave a proposition ought to go to our law committee.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will not.

Mr. HARRISON. A judge occupying a high official position and in the past honored, in my district, is charged with misconduct as such judge. In the petition which I present a large number of my constituents pray that a committee be appointed, so that his official conduct can be examined and reported on at once. We owe this to the judge himself, who wants an investigation, and desires that the investigation proceed at once.

There may be some who would say, "Send this question to the Committee on the Judiciary." But, sir, six of that committee are already employed on special matters—three on the Potter committee, three on an investigation in the city of New York. The Judiciary Committee has large business before it. Besides, this is such an examination that men should be appointed specially to look into the matter, so that this gentleman's character, if maligned, may be promptly vindicated, and the country informed that he deserves to stand well before his countrymen. If, on the other hand, the charges are not false, then my constituents have the right to be informed of the grounds on which those charges are made. This question is one of the highest privilege, one which, in the interest of the judge himself, my own personal friend, should be passed upon as quickly as possible.

If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] objects to the right to report at any time, I will strike out that portion of the resolution; but let him take the consequence of endeavoring to stifle the report before this House. I believe that as a question of privilege this matter ought to be reported upon at the earliest time when a conclusion may be reached. I ask that the question be put to the House and decided by it at once.

I yield for a moment to my colleague, [Mr. BURCHARD.]

Mr. BURCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I do not object to the resolution introduced by my colleague, but to the appointment of a special committee, and I move to amend the resolution so as to provide that, instead of appointing a special committee of five, this matter be investigated by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HARRISON. If the gentleman pleases, I did not yield for any amendment. I yield for his remarks, not for the offering of an amendment.

Mr. BURCHARD. Very well. Although my colleague does not yield for an amendment, this matter will have to be submitted to the House.

The SPEAKER. The subject is before the House, and before it as a question of privilege. That being the position of the resolution, it is certainly open to amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. When I yield the floor for amendment, but not before.

Mr. HALE. I suppose that the previous question, if called, can be voted down, and then the resolution can be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BURCHARD. If my colleague yields for remarks only, I will confine myself at present to a brief statement of my views in regard to the proposed investigation.

Mr. HARRISON. I only yielded to my colleague for remarks and not for amendment.

Mr. BURCHARD. This matter was brought up at the closing hours of the session just preceding the holiday recess. It was rumored there were gentlemen here who were whispering charges against a judge who stood so high in the estimation of the legal fraternity of Chicago and of the northern district of Illinois, as well as in the estimation of all the members of the House from the State of Illinois, that not one of those members solicited to do so was ready to indorse their petition and put it in the petition-box for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary. But just on the eve of adjournment, as the Speaker was about to raise his gavel to say this House stood adjourned under the concurrent resolution of the two Houses until the 7th of January following, I did object to such a paper being presented as from the Speaker's table, because it seemed unfair to send out such charges without any opportunity for denial and immediate investigation. We then returned home, and my colleague now deems it his duty to do what he did not do then, and that is, indorse and present this petition.

Now, Mr. Speaker, Judge Blodgett himself, as well as the friends of Judge Blodgett, does not object, and the members of the delegation upon this floor from the State of Illinois do not object, to this investigation; and the petition to which my colleague has referred is signed by men, who, hearing these rumors and believing the reputation of this judge is unstained, have joined in asking that there may be an investigation. But such investigation should be made by the usual committee, by the Committee on the Judiciary, made up of lawyers, of men selected by the Speaker from the body of the House because of their legal standing and attainments, of men who have the confidence of the House and whose unbiased conclusions would command the respect of the community. Let them take charge of the proceeding, and Judge Blodgett will not only be content but court the most thorough examination of his official conduct. I presume a fair committee would be appointed by the Speaker under the resolution, but a special committee would not have such appearance of impartiality and such weight would not be given to its conclusions as would be given if the charges were examined, as I believe in every other case (at least within my recollection) they have been, by the Law Committee of this House.

The friends of Judge Blodgett and Judge Blodgett himself desire investigation should be had, and he has sent to me to present to the House a letter addressed to you, Mr. Speaker, which I desire to have read. I send it up to the Clerk's desk for that purpose.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to have the petition read embodying the facts, so we may know whether it should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary or not?

The SPEAKER. The petition will be read if the gentleman so desires.

Mr. BURCHARD. What does the gentleman ask?

Mr. BRIGHT. I wish to have the petition read to see the facts which it embodies.

The SPEAKER. The reading of the petition would not be taken out of the time of any member. Does the gentleman desire to have it read?

Mr. BRIGHT. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. I yielded to my colleague for a moment, and I think he has taken it. I do not object to the letter being read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DISTRICT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, NORTHERN DISTRICT OF ILLINOIS.
(Hon. H. W. BLODGETT, Judge.)

CHICAGO, January 4, 1879.

SIR: It has been widely stated through the public press that certain citizens of Chicago, namely, Messrs. John I. Cooper, Henry I. Sheldon, and John J. Knickerbocker, intend to apply to the honorable the House of Representatives to order an examination into alleged charges touching my official conduct as judge of the United States district court. The nature of such charges has been carefully concealed from me, and I have no knowledge of the specific grounds upon which such application is sought to be made. I am well aware of the doubtful propriety of a judge, subjected to groundless, malicious, and secret attacks, deeming it necessary to ask for an investigation, and the danger of establishing a questionable precedent in that regard; yet such has been the persistency with which vague assertions have been made that I have been guilty of offenses justifying impeachment, and so important is it that the character of judicial officers should be without suspicion, that, leaving out of view the pain inflicted on me by allowing the circulation of such rumors unanswered, I feel it my duty to address the House of Representatives through you, as its presiding officer, on the subject, and to solicit the most thorough and searching inquiry in the premises; and I earnestly urge that the House of Representatives take such order as will enable any charges supposed to exist to be brought forward by these or any other persons and rigorously investigate the same.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. W. BLODGETT.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. BURCHARD. A word more, Mr. Speaker, and I will not then further trespass upon the time of my colleague. I hope my colleague will not object to the House voting upon the question which almost if not invariably is allowed to be voted upon, as to what committee shall take charge of a subject presented for consideration. Let the House vote. And I insist that the House ought to have the opportunity to vote whether it will send this to a special committee or to the usual standing committee of the House—the Committee on the Judiciary. If my colleague insists that I shall not offer the amendment now, I hope the House by refusing to sustain the previous question will permit a vote to be taken whether this subject shall be referred to a standing or to a special committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, my colleague who has just taken his seat has referred to the presentation through the Speaker of a petition on the last day before the holiday recess. I, recognizing the right of petition, consented to present this petition, but at the same time claimed the discretion as to when it should be presented, and I therefore refused to present it on the heel of the session. I let it be known that I would go home, examine into this question, and see if doing my duty as a Representative I should present the petition and offer the resolution. There is now before the House a petition that in three days was signed by nearly six thousand of my constituents. Among them are leading wholesale merchants, great manufacturers, leading lumbermen, and real-estate men, asking that a special committee be appointed to go to Chicago and there satisfy my constituents that this man stands upright before the community, or if he has done wrong that this House would take the proper action in the matter.

Now, sir, in all of the past, preliminary examinations of this kind have not been made by the Judiciary Committee. The committee of investigation into the affairs of the War Department introduced resolutions here for the impeachment of Mr. Belknap. It has been almost universally the case that through such committees, other than the Judiciary Committee, the facts have been brought to the notice of this House.

Now, sir, the Committee on the Judiciary is composed of learned and honorable men. No man here holds it in higher honor than I; but, sir, three members of that committee are already on investigating committees; three members I believe have been sent to New York to investigate the Davenport matter; and another gentleman on that committee, I regret to say, because he is one of my nearest and dearest friends, is this day ill and in danger of a long-continued illness. Thus there are six or seven members of that committee consisting of eleven who cannot act at once.

My constituents want a committee sent to Chicago where the witnesses are, where the records are, and where this Government will be subjected to a vast deal less expense than if witnesses were sent for to be brought to the city of Washington. I do think that no man, if he be a true friend of Judge Blodgett, will object to the course I have proposed. Lyman Trumbull, last week, in a speech before the bar association of my city, said that were he in the position of Judge Blodgett the sun should not go down before he would ask for an investigation. Let not men here, endeavoring, not possibly to screen Judge Blodgett, but to hide other facts, try to impede an investigation so as to leave that high judge charged with malfeasance and the scrutiny of that malfeasance wholly impossible probably for weeks, possibly until the end of this session. There are able lawyers in this House, men who, with all due respect to the Judiciary Committee, are their peers. The Speaker can select such men; not partisans. There is no partisanship in this question. The mass of the men who signed that petition charging misconduct are republicans, not democrats. There is no party in it. The gentlemen who prefer the charges are republicans. Many of the leading names on the large petition are republicans. That army of nearly six thousand names is composed of citizens of both parties.

It is simply that the people of my city, second to none in this Union for its vast business before the district courts, come before this House asking that it shall be ascertained, and ascertained as quickly as possible, whether this man is corrupt or not. I hope this House will vote a special committee, and that the Speaker will put upon it men whose character and the value of whose opinion will be such that no man will say, when their opinion is given, that there has been whitewashing or anything else than an honest report.

Before moving the previous question I ask that both the petitions be read; and as regards the second petition, that the petition only be read, and not the names attached.

Mr. BRIGHT. After the petitions are read, I hope the gentleman from Illinois will yield to me for a remark in relation to them before he calls the previous question.

The Clerk read the petitions, as follows:

To the honorable the Speaker and members of the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners, John S. Cooper, Henry I. Sheldon, and John J. Knickerbocker, most respectfully represent and show that they are citizens of the United States, and reside in the city of Chicago, in the northern district of Illinois, where they have resided for a period of more than twelve years, and have been engaged in the practice of the law for more than ten years, respectively.

Your petitioners further show that Henry W. Blodgett, the district judge of the United States for said northern district of Illinois, has, for the past six years and upwards, so used and employed his judicial office as presiding judge in the district and circuit courts for said district as to bring reproach and scandal upon the administration of justice therein. He has been guilty as such judge of gross favoritism toward his friends and severe judicial oppression against his enemies. He has been unmindful of the rules of law in his judicial judgments. He has allowed parties and their counsel to make to him out of court ex parte statements of their respective causes before the same should be heard before him as such judge, by means of which he has become so prejudiced against the opposite party that his judicial judgments have been contrary to the facts established by the evidence proven before him and the law applicable thereto. Having been attorney for railroads and a manager thereof for many years prior to his elevation to the bench, his rulings, orders, and judgments in causes where railway corporations have been parties thereto have been grossly and unjustly in favor of such railway corporations.

He has so employed his judicial office as by gross partiality toward the older and more influential lawyers practicing in his court to endeavor to make them his friends and defenders, while at the same time he has toward the younger and less influential attorneys practicing in his court borne himself in a harsh, severe, and arbitrary manner and has so administered his high office as to impede and obstruct the administration of justice in said courts and prevent the conviction and punishment of those charged with, and guilty of, crimes against the Government of the United States; and lastly, he has been guilty of corruption in his office as such district judge.

Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray your honorable body to investigate the official conduct of said Henry W. Blodgett, as such district judge, by your committee and to take such further action as may seem wise and necessary, to the end that the administration of justice may be kept pure in said judicial district.

And your petitioners, as they are in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

JOHN S. COOPER.
HENRY I. SHELDON
JOHN J. KNICKERBOCKER.

To the honorable the Speaker and members of the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Whereas certain grave rumors have been widely circulated in the city of Chicago and elsewhere affecting the honor and dignity of the judge of the United States district court for the northern district of Illinois; and

Whereas your petitioners believe it to be for the true interest both of the Hon. Henry W. Blodgett, judge of said court, and this community that the official conduct of his honor, Judge Blodgett, should be inquired into by your honorable body:

Therefore your petitioners, citizens of the United States and residents of Chicago, do most respectfully petition your honorable body to appoint a special committee, with power to send for persons and papers, to visit Chicago, and investigate the official conduct of said district judge.

Mr. HARRISON. There is a petition, signed, as I state, by six thousand of my constituents, asking for a special committee to visit Chicago. If the House refuses to send it to a special committee, and decides to send it to the Judiciary Committee, I cannot help it. I will yield to a vote on the amendment. I will ask, however, that the petition be sent to a special committee. I care not whether I am on that committee or not. I want a committee framed with special reference to this question. Therefore I yield for the amendment, and ask for a vote at once. The petitioners pray for speedy action. They think that can be had only through a special committee. They lack not confidence in the Judiciary Committee, but they fear its duties will prevent prompt action. They know how that committee is now employed, and let me assure gentlemen that if you refuse the prayer of these petitioners they will regard it as evidence of indisposition on the part of some to have an inquiry and report this session. The friends of Judge Blodgett who object to a special committee may thus stifle an investigation, but they leave him resting under the suspicion of not really wishing a fair scrutiny. I therefore hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. TUCKER rose.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 5682) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for transportation of mails by railroad for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879;

An act (H. R. No. 5535) changing the time of holding the terms of the United States circuit court for the district of West Virginia;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 210) making an appropriation for the purpose of paying the necessary expenses incurred in investigating the origin and causes of epidemic diseases in the United States;

An act (H. R. No. 5532) authorizing the donation of twenty condemned bronze cannon to aid in the erection of a monument to the memory of General George A. Custer, at the Military Academy at West Point;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) extending time for Joint Committee on Transfer of Indian Bureau to report;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 206) providing for the distribution of the Revised Statutes of the United States to the Post-Office Department; and

An act (H. R. No. 5683) to amend an act approved June 20, 1878, and to fix the rate of interest on bonds authorized by said act to be issued by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

CHARGES AGAINST JUDGE BLODGETT.

Mr. TUCKER. I agree with my friend from Illinois that there ought to be an investigation of these charges. A judge ought to be above suspicion. If, therefore, six thousand citizens of Illinois have petitioned for an investigation of the charges which they make against him and which seriously affect his judicial character, I suppose there can be no doubt upon either side of the House that it is due to him as well as to the people that the House shall make an investigation, and the only question is what would be the proper tribunal to investigate. It seems to me that if the result of the investigation should be the presentation of articles of impeachment, it is proper that the Judiciary Committee of the House, charged with that class of questions, should make the investigation. I can see no reason for a special committee. I suppose that the Speaker of the House in forming the Committee on the Judiciary selected the best lawyers in the House, or at least those who are the peers of any lawyers here. I can see no reason why a select committee should be appointed.

As to who shall be chairman of the committee investigating this matter, I suppose that is a matter of no importance; but it seems to me that if we have special committees for these investigations when we have standing committees which can carry them on, it will be a violation of the rules and practice of the House and might lead to great inconveniences. I shall therefore vote for an amendment, if such a one be offered, to refer this matter to the standing committee of the House.

The SPEAKER. The rules of the House give privilege to the House to determine whether a matter shall be considered by a standing committee of the House or by a committee specially appointed.

Mr. HANNA. I would like to say a word upon this question. Although I am not a Representative from Illinois, yet Judge Blodgett holds court for us in the State of Indiana, for it becomes necessary for Judge Gresham and Judge Blodgett to exchange. In this way the bar of Indiana, so far as they practice in the United States courts, have become acquainted with Judge Blodgett, and I am frank to say, from my personal acquaintance with him, that he would desire an investigation. I care not what committee makes the investigation, but it seems to me that it would be better to have the investigation made by the Committee on the Judiciary, because their decision of the case would not be subject to the criticism that might be applied to the decision of a special committee. If one were appointed, it might be said that it was organized at the instance of those who are here for the time being as prosecutors. That is no part of the business of the House. I want to see the case fairly, impartially, and fully investigated; and for one, I prefer that that investigation shall be made by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The question is first upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD,] to strike out all that part of the resolution which relates to the appointment of a special committee of five and refer the matter to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. BURCHARD, and it was agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the resolution as amended, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to hear the resolution read as it stands amended.

The SPEAKER. The resolution was only amended in one particular, which was by striking out "special committee" and inserting "Committee on the Judiciary."

Mr. SPRINGER. Was it so amended as to authorize the committee to appoint a subcommittee to carry on this investigation?

The SPEAKER. It has been always usual for committees to appoint subcommittees, and the Chair supposed it would be done in this case.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAGE. I insist upon the regular order now.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the further consideration of the bill known as the Geneva award bill. If the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] desires to have a morning hour, he may reach his object by raising the question of consideration.

Mr. PAGE. I will do so. Then, I will inquire of the Chair, should the Geneva award bill be set aside will the regular order then be the call of committees for reports?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will assume, if the House shall refuse at this time to proceed with the consideration of the regular order, (fixed for this day after the reading of the Journal, and interrupted only by questions of higher privilege,) that the House wishes to have a morning hour for the purpose of receiving reports from committees.

Mr. SPRINGER. Would it be in order to ask unanimous consent to have a morning hour as of Monday for the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order to make that request. Does the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] yield for that purpose?

Mr. PAGE. I do not.

The SPEAKER. That is equivalent to an objection.

The question was then taken upon proceeding with the consideration of the Geneva award bill; and upon a division, there were—ayes 97, noes 23.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KNOTT, and Mr. WHITE of Pennsylvania, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 115, noes 23.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, (one of the tellers.) That does not make a quorum.

The SPEAKER. If that point is insisted upon, the tellers will resume their places and continue the count.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I do not insist upon that point.

No further count being insisted upon, the question was decided in the affirmative.

DISTRIBUTION OF GENEVA AWARD.

The House accordingly resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4553) to provide for the further distribution of the moneys received under the Geneva award.

The SPEAKER. Upon this question the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MANNING] is recognized by the Chair.

Mr. KNOTT. I understood that seventeen minutes of the time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] was still left.

The SPEAKER. Eighteen minutes.

Mr. KNOTT. And I understood that it was to be occupied by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair has caused search to be made for the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] but he has not been found.

Mr. HALE. Allow me to say to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT,] that I would hardly like to occupy the remaining time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] without further consultation with him. I know that he has had some intention to speak in his own time, and I have made arrangements to have some time from the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON.]

Mr. KNOTT. I have nothing further to say.

The SPEAKER. These are matters that should be regulated by the members of the committee. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MANNING] will proceed.

Mr. MANNING. Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively, and with much interest, to all the arguments that have been submitted both for and against the bill reported by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, for the further distribution of the Geneva-award fund, and have observed with some surprise the range the discussion has taken.

Not regarding it as important or even germane to recount the long and thrilling story of the achievements upon the high seas during the late war of either class of confederate cruisers, or to give the names, or the value of the vessels, or the value of their respective cargoes, that were destroyed, or the date and localities of such destruction, or to refer to the inimical conduct of Great Britain during this period, and the consequent transfer of our commerce from American to foreign bottoms, or to the demand on the part of this Government for indemnity for such conduct, or to the voluminous correspondence, and profound diplomacy that followed such demand, I come at once to the material facts, as the result of all these matters, namely, that the treaty of Washington was concluded on the 18th day of May, 1871; that the tribunal of arbitration therein provided for awarded this Government the sum $15,500,000 in gross for the benefit of our injured citizens, and in satisfaction of all demands against Great Britain; that about $10,000,000 of that fund yet remains undistributed; and that several classes of claimants have bitterly contested each other's demands upon this money from the time it came into our hands up to this moment.

Now, the absorbing inquiry is, what is the proper step to be taken by Congress in reference to this balance? Shall we organize this House into a tribunal, each member taking upon himself the duties of juror and judge, to consider all the testimony and the law touching the rights of each claimant, and then pronounce final judgment thereon, or shall we say, what in my opinion a proper regard for precedent, public business, and our own dignity and integrity demands we should declare, that such matters should be determined by the judicial branch of this Government?

We are informed by the majority and minority reports that upon the chief point in the disposition of this matter, that a court of justice should distribute the amount yet remaining of this fund, there was perfect agreement on the part of the Judiciary Committee, and I venture to believe that when there was concurrence upon this overshadowing question, there remained no substantial or valid grounds for disagreement as to the next and only step to be taken. The reasons are abundant, and they have been aptly stated in one of the reports, why this whole subject should be transferred from the arena of legislation to a court of justice. In this House the time is too limited, and the examination, on the part of many of us at least, unavoidably too hasty and superficial to reach mature conclusions in regard to such matters. And it is not only right in principle, but it is in perfect harmony with a long line of precedents in our own history, commencing over fifty years ago, and since then reaffirmed every few years, as will be seen by reference to the cases involving the distribution of the moneys realized under the treaties with Great Britain, Denmark, France, the Two Sicilies, Spain, Peru, Brazil, and China respectively, to transfer such matters from the halls of legislation—where extraneous considerations too often become so crystallized as to inspire, and finally assert, a controlling influence, and where improper lenses are, with the dexterity so characteristic of the lobbyist, too frequently placed in our spectacles, through which important and intricate subjects are to be seen—to a court, whose inquiries will be more thorough and searching, whose mature and dispassionate judgment alone will control, whose difficulties in ascertaining what is right and equitable between all litigants will not be so formidable as ours, and whose conclusions will be more satisfactory to all fair-minded men, and will afford a fuller vindication of our wisdom, dignity, and integrity.

Precedents when exactly in point with the case under consideration are usually held to have a binding authority, as well to keep the scales of justice even and steady as because the question to be decided has been solemnly considered and determined. And it is therefore a time-honored maxim that when a point has been settled by decision it forms a precedent which it is not wise to depart from, unless, in the language of Mr. Blackstone, "it is manifestly absurd and unjust." It is to be hoped that no step will be taken by the Congress of the United States to lessen the value of that great doctrine of stare decisis which has been so cordially approbated and observed through many generations by the good and wise men of the world.

Upon examination of the acts passed for the distribution of moneys which this Government received from the nations already named by me it will be seen that the learned gentlemen who submitted the majority report, and pending bill, have followed in the footsteps of our predecessors in similar cases. The most important parts of the present bill is in the precise language employed in the acts referred to, and their recommendation to this House to put itself in harmony with precedents, that have so many strong reasons to support them, should receive our heartiest commendation and concurrence.

When the gentlemen who signed the minority report assented to the propriety of sending claimants of the fund in question from Congress to a tribunal of justice—and in this conclusion no member who has thus far spoken has dissented, and no member, so far as I know, will object to this course—then I submit that the only remaining duty to be performed was to report a bill conferring the fullest discretion and the amplest power upon such court, with right of appeal, to hear and determine, without delay, the rights of all persons who desire to assert their claims upon the undistributed fund. If I am correct in this view of the subject the inquiry now to be made is whether the bill reported by a majority of the Judiciary Committee is so framed as to authorize "all persons and corporations" to go, with equal rights, abreast into court, with their lawyers and testimony, and demand adjudication upon their respective cases. It is insisted that the bill will permit only one class of claimants to recover judgments, when that class is the least worthy, but I submit that a careful examination of it will warrant the conclusion that the Judiciary Committee, in preparing and presenting it, wisely and impartially performed its duty, jealously protecting the rights of all, and casting unequal or improper burdens on none.

In the first section of the bill it is provided—

That all persons or corporations claiming to be entitled to any portions of the moneys now under the control of the United States, which were received from the government of Great Britain, are hereby authorized to sue for the same in the United States Court of Claims, at any time within one year from the passage of this act, in the same manner in which other claims are sued in said court; and the said court shall render judgment for each claimant who was an actual sufferer by the violation of the laws of neutrality by Great Britain, for such amounts only as in their opinion he shall be justly entitled to recover, under said treaty and award according to the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations, without regard to any rule or principle of allowance, exclusion, inclusion, or distribution heretofore adopted by Congress in chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress, or otherwise, or by the tribunal created by said law; but all payments heretofore made on any claims by the United States shall be deducted from the judgment to be rendered therein.

Here, it will be observed, is authority for "all persons and corporations" claiming any portions of the moneys in dispute, to sue for the same, "at any time within one year from the passage of this act," and the court can only render judgment for each claimant who was an "actual sufferer by the violation of the laws of neutrality by Great Britain;" and having decided that the claimant is an "actual sufferer," he is then entitled only to recover such sum as in the opinion of the court he should receive "under the treaty and award, according to the principles of justice, equity, and the laws of nations." What objection can there be, either on the part of the United States or by the "actual sufferers," to the distribution of this fund pursuant to the standard thus established? The language employed in the section just read is, it seems to me, manifestly too broad and comprehensive to be tortured into any further discrimination between claimants, either when they enter court or during the progress of their causes, than justice and equity may make necessary, in the judgment of the court, even though the merest tyro occupied the bench. No man has cause to complain if the guide-star of law-makers be "justice and equity." The losses by the exculpated and inculpated cruisers, the insurance companies, and the war premium claimants, all enter the same court, at the same time, and stand upon an equal footing before judges whose well-stored minds and integrity of character can be confidently relied upon, to observe with scrupulous care the injunction laid upon them in the bill, namely, to promptly hear and determine the cases of all "actual sufferers" according to the principles of justice and equity. It is difficult to understand upon what ground objection can be urged, especially by the lawyers of this House, to such a basis of adjudication as this.

What sympathy would a defeated litigant be entitled to if he failed because "justice and equity" were against him? But it has been argued that as claimants are only "entitled to recover under said treaty and award according to the principles of justice," &c., that the Court of Claims will be forced by the words "under said treaty and award" to discriminate against certain classes of claimants whose demands were unfavorably considered by the Geneva board of arbitration. In reply to this I submit that the bill would not, I think, have its scope either broadened or narrowed if the objectionable words were stricken out. It would be unaffected by such amendment, because the court, in determining cases under this bill "according to the principles of justice and equity," could not disregard "the treaty and award." Speaking for myself alone, I do not hesitate to declare my entire willingness for the court to give all due weight to that treaty and the proceedings thereunder. Both the treaty and award resulted from our demands upon Great Britain, and if their observance entitle only one class of claimants to judgment let the court so decide. I opine that disinterested people will readily indorse such judgments, even though they have taken the trouble to become well acquainted with the facts, and have opinions of their own touching the merits of these respective classes. Fiat justitia, ruat calum.

Again, it has been argued that the bill should not require the court to consider "the laws of nations." But I submit that this objection is not well founded. Law-writers inform us that the law of nations is divided usually into two branches, natural and positive, the former applying to all men and all nations, and the latter consisting of those rules and obligations which result from compacts, treaties or agreements. Hence, "the law of nations" to be considered by the court is that positive law which has been established between this Government and Great Britain touching the matter in question. I hope that we will content ourselves with the pending bill, which we have seen provides for the prompt adjudication both by the Court of Claims, and then by the highest tribunal in the Government, of all classes of cases connected with this matter.

To go further in this discussion, as all gentlemen who have thus far addressed this House have done, except Mr. STENGER, of Pennsylvania, is, in my judgment at least, supererogatory, and I venture to apprehend will result in embarrassment to the courts, if not in positive injury to litigants therein. Gentlemen have delivered long and exhaustive arguments, but they have addressed themselves almost wholly to the merits of different claimants, which I insist is beyond the proper scope of this debate. If we knew less of the contest over this fund we would perhaps more quickly and wisely agree upon a bill that would do ample justice to all. I do not personally know a human being who is interested in any part of the millions yet in our hands, and I have only troubled myself to go far enough in my examination to determine my duty in regard to the proposed transfer, and the provisions of the bill pursuant to that conclusion, wholly ignoring the merits of the dispute over the money.

As the contest has grown greater and greater in bitterness among claimants, I have become more and more fixed in the purpose to support this bill. When I reached the conclusion that Congress should not undertake to adjust the conflicting demands about which we have heard so much, being wholly free from any inclination to settle in my own mind the rights of different parties, I then addressed myself to the examination of the pending bill, and the substitute therefor, without even a shade of bias either for or against any one. If I believed that this bill did not secure equal rights to all "actual sufferers" by prompt trials in the Court of Claims, and then by the court of last resort, if desired by litigants, I certainly would not favor it; and I will remark here that I was shaken rather than strengthened in my support after the argument a few weeks ago of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] in behalf of the bill. He informed us that he spoke at the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] who reported the bill, and I presumed that he reflected that gentleman's views thereof. As he argued throughout his remarks that one class of claimants alone should receive this fund, I had to look again to the bill, and more critically than ever examine its provisions, to be reassured of the correctness of my former conclusion that all classes would stand alike in court.

Mr. KNOTT. The gentleman from Mississippi will allow me to interrupt him for a moment. When I requested or suggested to the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] that it would be proper for him to take part in this discussion it was because he had himself in a very able report in a former Congress advocated precisely what the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary had reported to the House in the present instance. I did not know, I had no reason to suppose, he would take any different ground from that occupied by him in his former report.

Mr. MANNING. I did not object, Mr. Speaker, to the conclusion to which the gentleman from New York arrived. I only objected to the arguments adduced, and the grounds relied upon by him in reaching that conclusion.

The speech of the learned gentleman was indeed cogent and possibly unanswerable upon the side of certain claimants; and while I was much interested in the close, compact, and logical presentation of his views, I beg pardon for saying that I was not much aided by him in reaching a conclusion as to the scope and meaning of the bill under discussion. I doubt not that much of his argument, in the event of the passage of this bill, will be often quoted and vigorously pressed upon the Court of Claims, and also upon the Supreme Court, in the interest of a certain class of claimants, to show the true purpose of the bill. I am sure that the utterances of so distinguished a lawyer and statesman will not fail to be highly persuasive both here and elsewhere; and therefore I hope before this discussion has terminated that those gentlemen of the Judiciary Committee who originated and matured the bill, will inform this House whether or not it was their aim to give "all persons and corporations" claiming an interest in the fund equal rights in court, and whether they now think the pending bill accomplishes that object.

The objections to the substitute are, first, that it transfers these claimants to a commission, from whose judgment no appeal can be taken; second, it trammels the tribunal in its consideration of causes submitted to it, thereby, I think, placing this Government in a questionable attitude in reference to this undistributed balance; and third, it would probably result in the permanent establishment of a court, at present unknown to our judicial system, thus swelling the offices of this Government, now amounting to about one hundred thousand. For the arguments to support these objections I beg leave to refer to the views expressed in a former Congress by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] but who, it seems, has receded from those views, and is now on the other side of this question. As attention has been called to these arguments, and elaborated and made, if possible, stronger and more conclusive by Mr. STENGER, I shall not consume time to have them read again by the Clerk. I hope they will have the effect to, at least, convince their author [Mr. BUTLER] that his original conclusion was right, and that the pending bill should be passed.

In conclusion I desire to say that it is high time that this Government should discharge its duty in regard to this money, by ascertaining whether its citizens have just claims thereon; whether it shall be covered into our Treasury, or returned to Great Britain. Justice to the Government and to claimants alike demand an early disposition of this matter, and I hope that if the fund in question cannot be distributed "under the treaty and award, according to the principles of justice, equity, and the laws of nations," that it will be promptly returned to Great Britain.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, the pending measure comes to us in a different way from the usual course of legislation. For the time being this body assumes some of the functions of a judicial tribunal, before which certain individual interests are to be determined, and with this semi-judicial function comes all the responsibility that justly attaches to it. We cannot absolve ourselves from the responsibility we thus assume by settling it as a mere question of popular opinion or as a mere question of equity untrammeled by law. The money was given to meet certain losses incurred in a certain way, and belongs to certain individuals.

The men who lost the vessels may have died; the firms may have broken up; every right inuring under it may have passed by bargain or assignment; the vessels may have been insured by American citizens for American citizens, and both the premiums and the policy been paid; but since neither of these accidents or local circumstances absolved Great Britain from paying for these losses, it is difficult to see on what ground of equity we are justified in setting either of them aside. This subject comes before us with all the sanction and sacredness of treaty stipulation, which we cannot assume this body will change or ruthlessly violate. It comes to us with all the dignity of international arbitration; and while it is true we have reserved the power of determining the manner of dividing the award among the claimants, it is equally true that the award was to be paid for losses of a certain specified character, and that vested rights obtain therein only to a certain class of losers. We cannot afford to divert one cent of it from its legitimate objects. We cannot afford that a single nation represented at Geneva should have the license to say that we obtained money on false pretenses, or that we obtained it for one purpose and used it for another. The dignity of the Government and the honor of this House alike forbid it. This is not, therefore, a vested discretion in us, but a mere inquiry to whom does this money legally and legitimately belong. It is a question of evidence and law, and I need not add that we cannot properly or safely hear and determine the individual cases in this House.

I am aware of the embarrassments that present themselves to the minds of many members of this body. There is among our people an instinctive love of fair play, a desire for simple, sensible equity untrammeled by technicalities, and we therefore ask, why should an insurance company that has received the great war premiums have a bonus given them from this salvage? If their business was conducted on proper principles they have already received a profit over and above what they paid. Again we ask, if a man has insured and has received his insurance, why should he be paid for his property again? And still another query, if a man has not insured, on what principle of equity shall he claim the whole of the award to the exclusion of those who conducted their affairs on safer business principles? Again we ask, because a man has suffered from depredations not included or causes not admitted, shall we take the money in which other parties have legal rights and pay it to reimburse him? Will this claim be strengthened because he may be poor and they may be rich? Shall we imitate Robin Hood, who

> Robbed the rich and did bestow
> Upon such as were poor and low.

Great Britain did not assume to inquire who were the proper claimants. She paid fifteen millions and a half, which it was estimated would meet all claims of a certain class, and I cannot see that we are warranted in setting aside any of them.

It is true that corporations and companies are not popular. This prejudice has been used on this floor in discussing this question as an argument for their exclusion. The American citizen who studies the genius and spirit of American institutions is waking to the consciousness that these great creations of modern times have grown into proportions that were never contemplated, and exercise their power after a fashion injurious to the individual interests and dangerous to the public safety. He is like the fisherman in the old Arabian tale, who dragged a small vessel from the sea in his net, and when he opened it a small cloud of smoke issued therefrom, which ascended toward the sky and spread out until it had darkened all the heavens, and finally assumed the shape of a monstrous tyrannical genie, and used the first moment of its liberty to kick the small vessel from which it came into the sea. We stand amazed at the aggregated wealth and power of these concerns which so overshadow us. A business man may grow to be a millionaire. His shrewd, enterprising fingers are like magnets, which irresistibly draw wealth from the most remote and intricate channels of society, until it has swelled to millions on millions, and the laboring man who earns and eats his daily bread is awed and enchained as he looks at it. But the millionaire dies. Under our admirable social and political system his wealth breaks into fragments. It melts like snow under the sunshine of American institutions and floats back to the people from whom it was taken, and well-hoarded estates, which are preserved carefully by idle generations, are, under our institutions, the only real public calamities.

A corporation never dies. Its highest aspiration is to triumph over death and the sheriff. Like Melchisedec, it is without beginning of days or end of life. The American people to-day are only emerging from the vestibule into the condition of society which is to be governed by these modern creations. They watch their rapid and colossal growth, their unscrupulous exercise of power, and the almost illimitable future that seems to be before them, and as they gaze they regard them with mingled feelings of hatred and distrust.

Insurance companies are not so odious as railroad and some other companies, but the different kinds of them are far from popular. So many of them are organized on an unsafe and dishonest basis, or are conducted in violation of every safe business maxim, that all have fallen to some extent into disrepute. There is a widespread suspicion that they spend the money intrusted to them in exorbitant salaries or interested and bad investments, and that they break whenever it is more profitable to break than to pay. And thus it happens that, while many honorable men may be engaged in them, when they approach a representative body they are treated as if they were common swindlers and public enemies, and had no rights a legislature were bound to respect. Still they have certain legal rights we cannot justly ignore. They undoubtedly have some kind of an interest in this Geneva award. That they may be required to pay the excessive war risk to those who paid it is at least a reasonable subject of inquiry; but no one will deny that if the sunken vessels could by some hitherto undiscovered process be raised from the bottom of the ocean the insurance companies would be entitled to repay themselves from such salvage, whether they had made a profit or not.

I cannot but regret, Mr. Speaker, that the question should not have been submitted to us by a unanimous report from the Judiciary Committee. I have great confidence in its learning and fairness; but these gentlemen appear before us with several different propositions, and they must not wonder if this House is affected by some of the embarrassments which seem to have affected them. I am inclined to support the report of the majority, not that it covers all I could wish or that it may not work some hardship, but I do not see as fair a proposition in any of the other reports. It refers the individual claims to an organized tribunal where, under international and common law and the equities on which these rest, the cases can be heard and adjudicated. It does not fear a legal scrutiny or a legal verdict.

For my part, I desire to see every legal claim properly covered by the award faithfully paid, and, sir, if there be any surplus, instead of appropriating that to any purpose not contemplated, I am in favor of sending it back to them. American statesmen first introduced arbitration and honest, peaceful, Christian statesmanship among the nations, and cannot afford to be lost in the mazes of a tricky diplomacy. If England obtained more than was her due on the fishery award by the wiles of diplomacy, it is better that she should do it than that we should imitate her. If there is an honorable Englishman who so contemplates their apparent gain on the fishery award, I am sure he must think that the sum obtained was not worth what it cost. Let us elevate diplomacy to the just and Christian standard that honor unsullied and justice maintained are the noblest and best safeguards for national peace and the peace of the race, and that while Brother Jonathan may be the most enterprising of the nations he also shall stand first in vindicating the good name of his country.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MANNING] has eighteen minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. MANNING. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT.]

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of going into the details of this question; they have already been elaborately discussed. Indeed, I do not think the question is one of details, but a question of jurisdiction; whether the Congress of the United States or the judiciary of the United States shall determine the rights of the respective claimants under the Geneva award. I think, Mr. Speaker, the question is all in a nutshell. I think I shall have but little difficulty in digging the heart out of the question without elaborating to any great extent; and, if I can have the attention of this House, I propose briefly to make a suggestive rather than an elaborative argument.

What is the main fact in the case? The Government of the United States, as the prochain ami or next friend of certain citizens who claim to have been injured by reason of the violation of our neutrality laws, recovered indemnity from the British government. Having recovered it, it holds that indemnity now as trustee. I presume that there is no controversy on that subject, because the Government has already entered upon the distribution of the fund, and by so doing has admitted the fact that it holds it only as trustee and for the benefit of proper claimants.

Then the next question that presents itself to us is this: Who are the proper participants in this fund? The Government has no claim to it. There are certain persons who claim to have been injured by what are called inculpated cruisers; others that say they have been injured by reason of exculpated cruisers; others say they are entitled by right of substitution growing out of their insurance policies; others say they are entitled by reason of the payment of war premiums. With these varied claims presented to the United States, I submit that not a single member of this Congress is now prepared to decide and determine judicially as to the right of a single claimant under this award; not one. I know that I am not prepared. Perhaps others have been more diligent and have given the subject more thorough investigation than I have. But while that is so, I apprehend that no member is prepared as a judge to decide between these different claimants.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the question comes back upon us, Who is to decide in relation to these claims and what is the nature of the claim to be decided? I maintain that is purely a judicial question; that it is not an executive question, not a legislative question. The executive has no power to determine it. Congress has said it has no power to determine it. Then the question comes back, Who is to determine it? This bill proposed by the majority answers the question—that it ought to be referred to a judicial tribunal clothed with sufficient power to hear and determine the complaints and all the rights of all the different claimants who may present their claims for adjudication.

Now, am I correct in that? I propose, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the House to article 3, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States; and I invite the attention of Representatives especially to this constitutional question, because it is one that should control the action of this body. Here is the provision of the Constitution:

The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we find that the term "shall," the imperative, is used, and the extent and range of the judicial power is defined. After the Government of the United States had enforced what might be called a political right in favor of the citizen, that is, requiring the payment of the indemnity upon the part of Great Britain, then the question ceased to be a political question; it ceased to be a national or an international question. It then became absolutely an individual question, and the point I make is this: that no authority can be found in any law-book, nor in the Constitution of the United States, to sustain the legislative power in determining judicial rights between citizens of the United States.

Now, if there were a political element involved in the question the jurisdiction of Congress might properly attach to that question; but there is no political obligation upon the part of this body to determine any undetermined question which remains in the case. The only political question that was involved in it was the obligation to enforce the right of the citizen against a foreign nation, simply because the citizen could not have a hearing individually before the nations of the earth. The Government has exhausted that power, has fully discharged its duty to the citizen, has recovered the indemnity and now holds it, so that the question simply comes back upon us, what further supplemental duty is necessary upon the part of Congress? It is simply to obey the Constitution, to refer these rights of individuals to the judiciary, which alone has power to determine such rights.

This, sir, is not a controversy between the Government and the individual. It is a controversy between individuals as to rights already acquired, and Congress has no power to destroy existing rights, nor to create new rights which do not already exist under the award. Therefore, if we here were to make the award payable to either one or the other of these parties it would not settle the question, because it would be an illegal and unwarranted distribution of the fund, and the true claimant would come back from Congress to Congress until his right was fully vindicated.

Then, we have no power to create a right. Rights have already been created. We have only power to provide the machinery or the court through which the rights are to be enforced. I maintain that this position is well supported by authority and verified by the commentary on the Constitution to which I will call the attention of the House for one moment. I read from a note of Judge Paschal in his annotated edition of the Constitution:

Judicial power, as contradistinguished from legislative power and executive power, is the power to hear and determine all the cases of law and fact which arise between the Government and parties or between parties under the Constitution, the law of nations and the laws and treaties of the United States which shall be legally brought within the cognizance and jurisdiction of the courts or judicial tribunals established under the Constitution. It was intended to be a separate department of the Government, possessing all the judicial power of the National Government except upon the single jurisdiction of impeachment—not a power to control other departments of the Government in their official action, but to act independently of them under the Constitution and laws.

Then he draws the distinction between a purely judicial question and a question of a compound character involving the judicial and the political. And here is his comment on this subject:

But the judicial power does not extend to all questions which arise under the Constitution, laws, and treaties, because many of these are political and have to be solved by other departments of the Government.

There is the distinction fairly drawn. I have shown this question is entirely denuded of any political ingredient, and has nothing but judicial ingredients connected with it, and the Constitution is imperative and compels adjudication of such questions by an independent and co-ordinate branch of the Government, to wit, the judiciary.

There is no other power known which can decide this question except the judicial power. Here are these different claimants; they present their case; it is composed of law and it is composed of fact. Who is to administer the law which has been already made? Who is to determine the facts which are submitted and laid before the judicial tribunals of the country? Why, surely Congress has no power to determine purely judicial questions. The question comes home to the tribunal which has been created properly for its adjudication, to wit, the judiciary established under the laws of the United States.

As a mere test of the application of this principle and to show how far short this body would fall of investigation and proper judgment upon these matters, let me ask where is the judicial evidence which has been submitted to this body as to the right of a single individual? There is not a single claim presented here supported by testimony. It is simply an application to Congress to provide for the distribution of a fund among certain claimants. "Wheresoever the body is, thither will the eagles be gathered together." Here are a thousand claimants to what remains of this Geneva award. Who is to determine it? Send them to the courts. All the facts and circumstances are purely judicial in their character, which ought to be determined by the courts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I am correct in this presentation of argument that is the end of it; and I think I may safely challenge any individual to show there is any error in it. I present to him the Constitution of the United States and tell him before he can erect any other tribunal that will settle the question he must strike down that instrument, and all other attempts to settle it will be nothing but mere usurpation on the part of the Congress. We do not sit in judgment upon the rights of individuals, as I have already stated. Wherever there is a political consideration, as I have shown, there jurisdiction is acquired by Congress. Otherwise we are only exercising a legislative function to provide the means or machinery by which the judiciary shall act.

Now, Mr. Speaker, unless this body shall refer these different claims to the Judiciary Committee for final adjudication with the right of appeal, then, from my knowledge of the past history of claims presented before this body, they will revive and return until they are gray with the age of a century. I have heard the dull thunder of such claims against the doors of Congress and the doors of the Treasury since I have been here, and why is it? Simply because Congress had failed to send them to a judicial tribunal with ample powers for final and conclusive adjudication.

I verily believe unless Congress shall wash its hands of these different claims, put them before the different tribunals of the country with ample jurisdiction to determine every question of law and equity and make that judgment conclusive upon all parties, we will hear those claimants beating at the doors of Congress for the next half a century.

Having said this much, Mr. Speaker, I will now yield the floor, and hope the bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary will be passed.

Mr. MANNING. I yield the remainder of my time to Mr. BACON.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I have only asked for a few moments in order that I may express in the briefest possible manner the ground upon which I shall found the vote I expect to give on this question. It seems to me, sir, some things may be well deemed to be settled, that we may take for granted in this discussion; and in the first place it appears to me entirely clear that the fund in question is not in the Treasury of the United States as a fund which we can distribute at our will and pleasure; that we do not hold it either to give it away or to cover it into the Treasury, or to lay our hands upon it by way of reprisal as a sort of remuneration for certain wrongs we may have fancied we have suffered or that we have sustained. Rather than to accede to such a mode of disposing of the balance of this fund, which would in effect constitute a confiscation of the entire amount remaining in our hands, I think I would consent to its restoration to Great Britain as so much more than we have been able to show on any principle of indemnity we were fairly entitled to retain. Such a method of reprisal as has been suggested in this debate, injurious and unjust as many, if not most, of us believe the Halifax award to have been, does not commend itself to my idea of what is in itself right and proper, nor is it in accord with that high sense of comity which should obtain between nations that have given to the principle of arbitration the commanding position it now occupies.

I do not deem that this fund is in any such position as the one thus suggested; that we are at liberty to deal with it in any such fashion, either to give it away or to appropriate it without rhyme or reason, as either our caprice, our avarice, or perhaps some even less worthy motive may prompt.

In the second place, sir, I consider that we hold this fund as a trustee. It is in the nature of a trust in our hands, and we hold it as trustees for those who can rightfully and justly claim it. There are those who assert claims upon this fund who insist that they have the right to appropriate it, and it is our business, as it seems to me, holding it thus in trust, to appropriate it as the laws of justice and equity demand at our hands.

Now, sir, who are these claimants? First, all those who suffered injuries at the hands of what are denominated and have been actually designated as the exculpated cruisers are by the award, in my judgment, set aside.

Those who paid extra war premiums, upon the same principle and proceeding upon the doctrines upon which the award is founded must be equally set aside. It would seem, therefore, to result as a necessary proposition that this fund belongs to those who suffered injuries at the hands of the inculpated cruisers who are specifically enumerated and designated in the Geneva award, and the injuries perpetrated by which cruisers thus designated, the tribunal examined and awarded a sum which in their judgment should cover the injuries which were suffered at their hands.

Now, if all this be so the result would seem to be pretty clear that those who suffered at the hands of those specific inculpated cruisers are the ones to be indemnified, and the only question that remains is to determine who they are and what they shall respectively receive. Now, sir, that is a question which we should find it very difficult to determine here, and therefore it would seem to me, and the proposition commends itself to my judgment, that the mode proposed in the report of the majority is the one most consonant to justice and equity. They do not propose to hand over this fund to any specific set of claimants, but they do propose to put the whole matter of the disposition of this fund into the hands of a judicial body to ascertain by proofs, by investigation, by inquiry in any and every quarter, and by all proper and legitimate methods, who are the proper parties to receive this fund. Can there be any tribunal better adapted to secure that end, any that can be less objectionable? The judicial body is the very body, it seems to me, that should deal with a question of this character; and therefore it is that in the attention I have given and the thought I have bestowed upon this matter I have come very clearly to the conclusion that the report of the majority should be sustained, and that we should hand over this whole subject to the disposal of the Court of Claims, and in that way we shall accomplish the ends of justice more satisfactorily than in any other mode. Let all that have or deem they have just claims upon this fund present them there, and there let them be heard and passed upon, and the country, if not the claimants, will I think be satisfied.

I cannot but admire the high, the almost chivalrous sense of honor that prompted the declarations of my esteemed colleague, [Mr. CHITTENDEN;] that, deeply interested as he was in certain insurance corporations, he would not consent to touch one farthing of this surplus fund until the individual sufferers by the exculpated rebel cruisers had been fully indemnified. But this is not a question that can be settled by impulses, however generous, or abnegation, however much we may admire the spirit from which it springs. It is a pure question of right, and the application of judicial principles to the ascertainment of the right and the enforcement of the appropriate remedy. As such, and in that aspect only, I am disposed to consider it, and the considerations I have thus hastily and imperfectly presented will be controlling in the vote I propose to give.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. FINLEY.) The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MANNING] has five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. MANNING. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I am hardly entitled to the courtesy which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MANNING] has granted me, having had my five minutes on this subject already. I desire to say but a single word to the constitutional argument made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT.] In order to develop the practical point in this question, I stated here the other day that I was an interested party, as one of the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company, and that the majority bill would certainly put hundreds if not thousands of dollars into my pocket. My objection to it is this: the gentleman from Tennessee read the Constitution to prove that this matter should be settled by the courts according to the treaty. Now, sir, I say, not being a lawyer, that under the treaty nobody will have a place in the courts but the insurance companies; nobody, sir; and the claims of the insurance companies do not absorb the money. There is more money than the insurance companies claim.

The bill of the majority, in plausible but misleading phraseology, proposes that this question shall be settled according to equity and the law of nations. Ay, sir, it is equity that I am for; and if we cannot have equity I am for sending the surplus money back to Great Britain. I do not deny the insurance claims, but I deny that this bill gives anybody else any chance whatever, either in the Court of Claims or before the Supreme Court of the United States. I have never been so impressed with the correctness of my position as when the gentleman read the Constitution. He claims that the division shall be made under the Constitution according to the treaty. That is the point, sir; and having an interest in the insurance companies and claiming equity and justice for all, I venture to predict that, if that bill shall pass, not one claim shall ever have any standing in court except the claims of the insurance companies, unless it may come of some miserable poor man who was chained to the deck of a ship and so lost the use of his arms or legs for life. There are such cases. They indeed can make their appeal to the court, and perhaps receive some compensation under the bill of the majority.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] is entitled to the eighteen minutes remaining of the hour of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. HALE. I would like the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] for a moment. I know he is very anxious to have this matter brought to a close. I understand that with the exception of what time I take there is to be no further debate except on the part of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MCMAHON,] who represent the two reports. Is that so?

Mr. KNOTT. That is the understanding.

Mr. HALE. And that the understanding is that the vote be taken to-morrow. I did not expect this would have come up to-day. I had not expected that there would be a quorum, and the memoranda I had are at my house. But I do not wish to delay the matter. What I now propose to the gentleman from Kentucky is that if this measure can go over till to-morrow, I will then occupy much less time than I should occupy if I were to speak to-night—I think not over fifteen minutes—and then the previous question can be called. I would prefer that, because I have not my memoranda with me, and I understand that there are other matters of detail business that can come up to-night.

The SPEAKER. The Chair then understands that the further consideration of the bill is to be postponed till to-morrow.

Mr. KNOTT. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I ask unanimous consent that the memorial just referred be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Honorable Senate of the United States:

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, respectfully represent that the continued immigration, or rather importation, of cooly slaves or Chinese laborers to this State is a violation of treaty stipulations, which provide that such immigration shall be voluntary, and is a very serious injury to the laboring classes, not only of our State, but of the entire Pacific coast, by the reduction of wages to starvation prices; that such importation of said Chinese and other Asiatic slave labor tends to drive white and all other free labor out of our country and ultimately compel all who subsist by manual labor to the alternative of choosing between starvation and crime; that at least 75 per cent. of all the earnings of said Chinese or cooly slave labor, instead of being in our midst, and thus contributing to our prosperity, is sent to China never to return, thus withdrawing the coin from our country and rapidly decreasing our circulating medium, to the great injury of the best interest of this State, and of the entire Pacific coast; that such Chinese laborers do not contribute to the wealth and prosperity of the country by the acquisition of property and the payment of taxes, but by pauperism and crime are a continual source of expense to the country and municipalities of this State; that the treaty of 1868 between the United States and China, known as the Burlingame treaty, has never been maintained on the part of China in accordance with its intent and meaning; the right of free migration and immigration which it recognizes was to be entirely voluntary, and to be exercised in view of expatriation. The Chinese have no right to be admitted under the circumstances in which they come here; they are usually brought in hordes in a condition of semi-slavery, and obligated to perform a term of servitude. The privilege accorded to contracting parties was upon condition that the immigration to either country by the citizens or subjects of the other should be a voluntary individual act; China has wholly failed to have that consideration observed, and the United States ought to revoke the privilege; therefore, we, your said memorialists, pray your honorable body to modify the treaty between the United States and the Empire of China so as to stop and prohibit the importation or immigration of Chinese and other Asiatic laborers to this coast.

Adopted by the senate October 12, 1878.

JOHN WHITEAKER,
President of the Senate.

Adopted by the house October 18, 1878.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Brigadier-General and Chief of Engineers.

Hon. GEORGE W. McCRARY,
Secretary of War.

DELAWARE RIVER, NEAR CHERRY ISLAND FLATS.
UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Philadelphia, Pa., December 2, 1878.

GENERAL: After careful examination of the Delaware River in the vicinity of Cherry Island Flats, considered in connection with the legitimate requirements of the navigation interests involved, I have the honor to submit the following report on and project for the improvement of this locality:

The Cherry Island Flats begin just below Old Man's Point, 25 miles from Philadelphia. At this point the river is 1¼ miles wide. At Deep Water Point, 5 miles below, it is 1 mile wide. Between the two the width increases to nearly 2 miles, and the flats lie in midstream, dividing the river into two channels.

In 1842, as shown by the general chart of the river, these flats were covered with from 8 to 12 feet of water. They have since risen until, over a considerable area, there are now but 1½ feet. The 18-foot curve, however, occupies about the same position as formerly.

The eastern channel was in 1842 much the better of the two, affording a practical draught of 20 feet, and a width between the 18-foot curves of from 300 to 600 yards. At present the draught is from 19 to 19½ feet, and the average width about 600 yards, decreasing to 480 yards at the narrowest place.

The distance between the 24-foot curves above and below the shoals has remained about the same, namely, 400 yards.

In 1842 the western channel had 19½ feet of water, but by a notable projection of the 18-foot curve from the western shore was narrowed to 150 yards for a considerable distance, and curved through an angle of 90°. It was therefore not used by heavy vessels, which have continued ever since to run the eastern channel.

This projection, however, has since disappeared, and the western channel consequently exhibits a marked improvement. It is now over 500 yards wide at the narrowest place, with an average width of over 800 yards, and a draught of 18½ feet to 19 feet. The distance between the 24-foot curves above and below the shoals is about 3,500 yards.

This enlargement of the western channel is a significant and important change when it is considered that the increased capacity is entirely due to the action of natural causes, while all the benefit of the passage of large steamers with deep screws has been given to the eastern one. Notwithstanding this advantage the pilots represent that the eastern channel is again decreasing both in width and depth.

It is probable that these complaints are due rather to the vessels which travel the river than to any rapid diminution in the capacity of the channel, but in any case the fact remains that the interruption to navigation caused by these shoals is yearly becoming more and more serious and the demands for its improvement constantly increasing in urgency.

A survey of this locality was therefore begun early in the season, but discontinued when it was learned that the Light-House Board had perfected arrangements for having one made over precisely the same ground with the view of determining the proper position for a new set of range-lights for the guidance of vessels past the flats.

The results of this survey are given on the accompanying chart, copied from that furnished the Light-House Board, with the addition of the 24-foot curve and the lines within which it is proposed to make the necessary improvements.

The western channel is strongly indicated as the proper one to improve by the following considerations:

First. It is already much wider than the eastern, with but slightly less draught. It has gained this width from natural causes alone, and the use of the channel by heavy vessels will increase its depth. The eastern channel, being abandoned, will decrease to its former dimensions and continue to deteriorate from disuse, and additional preponderance of natural scour will be gained for the western channel.

Second. During the months in which ice runs in the river the prevailing winds are from the north and west, and the ice is therefore driven upon the eastern shore, leaving the western side comparatively free.

Third. The main channel above the flats being on the western shore, vessels must in any case come to that side. The 24-foot curve at present forms a narrow loop in mid-stream connecting the head of Cherry Island Flats with the lower end of Marcus Hook Bar, within which is a probably decreasing depth of but 22 feet to 23½ feet, over which vessels must cross. There is therefore an additional obstruction on this route, and its improvement would ultimately involve maintaining a channel across the tide.

Fourth. The actual amount of dredging that would be required to secure a channel of the desired width and depth would probably be about the same in either case, with the chances of permanence largely in favor of the western channel.

The question of lighting the channel being one closely connected with that of improving it, and the utility of a range that vessels can closely follow being very great in maintaining a channel of limited width, the particular line drawn on the chart was selected for common recommendation after consultation between this office and that of the Light-House Board in this city for the following reasons:

First. It passes the lower end of the flats nearly where the old channel existed, and where, therefore, a certain stability and permanence of improvement are to be looked for.

Second. It makes the least angle with the normal currents of the river consistent with obtaining a site for the range-lights within any practicable distance, and is in fact on the whole coincident with them. Their natural and daily action will therefore aid both in constructing and maintaining a channel on this line.

Third. It avoids probable disturbance from the outflow of Christiana Creek, especially during freshets, by passing at a considerable distance from its mouth.

Fourth. It meets the range line below (that of the Deep Water Point Lights) in mid-channel, consequently vessels can alter their course in good water, and with a wide margin of safety and after turning will be guided up the middle of the river past the flats and left on the western shore with good water to Chester.

The project, therefore, for the improvement of the Delaware River in the vicinity of Cherry Island Flats is as follows, namely:

To connect the 24-foot curve in the channel west of the flats with the corresponding curve below the light by a straight cut 900 feet in width and 24 feet deep at mean low water, having for its axis the line shown on the accompanying tracing.

This line is 3,620 yards long and the least water upon it is 17 feet, but it crosses the 18-foot curve 100 yards either side this sounding.

Its average depth for the whole length is 19 feet 8 inches.

The average depth on the east side of the proposed cut is 19 feet 1 inch and on the west side 20 feet 5 inches. The entire amount of material to be removed is 1,750,000 cubic yards, and at twenty cents per yard the total cost of the improvement will be $304,000.

In this estimate, however, no account is taken of the certain auxiliary action of the natural flow when the cut shall have once been opened, nor of the additional assistance to be derived from the churning of the deep screws of heavy steamers. The material being principally a soft mud it is probable that the total cost of securing the desired channel will be reduced through these agencies by from 10 to 15 per cent.

Should funds be appropriated for this improvement, it is proposed to effect it gradually, making at first a cut 100 yards wide completely through the shoal to the full depth. This would cost $100,000, which could be profitably expended in one season.

The second season's operations would double the width of this channel by increasing it 50 yards on either side, and the total saving due to other agencies would be gained for the third season's operations, so that the total expense would be reduced to $200,000 or less.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. N. MACOMB,
Colonel of Engineers.

Brigadier-General A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for present consideration the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution to construe the act of Congress passed March 9, 1878, granting pensions to soldiers and seamen of the war of 1812.

Whereas, anticipating war with Great Britain, the Government of the United States received into its military and naval service persons who were discharged from such service less than fourteen days subsequent to June 18, 1812, the date of the formal declaration of war; and

Whereas, owing to the imperfect means of communication which existed at the date of the President's proclamation that peace had been established (February 18, 1815) between the United States and Great Britain, many persons who were received into the military and naval service of the United States to serve in the war of 1812 were retained in such service a considerable time after the establishment of peace: Now,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in the settlement of claims for pension and bounty lands on account of service in the war of 1812 the Commissioner of Pensions shall compute all the time the soldier served between June 1, 1812, and March 4, 1815, including the day of discharge.

Mr. RAINEY. I object to the present consideration of this resolution. It should be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and the War of 1812 have already considered the subject. This resolution was prepared by the Commissioner of Patents at my request.

Mr. RAINEY. Let the resolution be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It will be considered and reported upon promptly.

Mr. SPRINGER. If referred it should go to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the consideration of the resolution, and it is not before the House.
